Grateful John.

The occasional stroller could not fail to notice the agitation of the lank man with thin hair who paced the beach nervously, his anxious gaze bent upon the last bathhouse but one. At the sound of a woman's voice issuing from the diminutive structure the lank man might have been observed to tremble and break into a profuse perspiration.

"John."

It was a timid, shrieking voice.

"She mustn't do it," muttered the lank man to himself. "The end justifies the means."

He looked very desperate.

"John."

The woman's voice was a trifle more confident, not to say impatient.

"Ye-yes, Hannah."

"Are there many looking?"

He glanced at the deserted strand.

"About 4,000, Hannah."

A sound like a gasp came from the last bathhouse but one.

"Any ships passing, John?"

The lank man scanned the horizon.

"There's two excursion boats anchored right in front, Hannah."

"Oh!"

For a time the last bathhouse but one emitted nothing.

"John!"

The anxiety of the lank man had been gradually deepening.

"Yes, Hannah."

"Is the water c-c-cold, John?"

He gaxed at the rays of the heat radiating from the ocean's placid surface.

"A man has just been taken out with the cramps."

"Oh, dear."

The lank man hardly breathed.

"John."

"Hannah."

"It will take so long to get my hair dry."

His betokened a reviving courage.

"Unquestionably, Hannah."

"I don't believe I'll go in, John."

"Why, Hannah?"

He simulated the accents of regret, but his face glowed with satisfaction.

"No, John, I shan't go in."

"Thank heaven," he whispered devoutly. "Again the world is prevented from learning that I married only for money."—Detroit Tribune.

Laying the Blame.

As the grocer saw him enter the store with a quick, angry step, he knew he had no ordinary customer to deal with. The man strode over to the counter, threw down a basket he had been carrying and delivered himself of a little speech he had evidently rehearsed on the way.

"This is an infernal outrage on a citizen and a—a—cash customer," he thundered, bringing his closed fist down with a thump. "Here you have not only swindled me out of my good money, but made me appear a poor, miserable fool in the eyes of my wife—my wife, sir! Just look at those—those—fossils, sir, and tell me what you mean by selling such things."

The grocer silently opened the little basket, but slammed down the lid the next moment and moved nearer the door, where he could catch the fresh air. In a yellow bowl inside the basket were half a dozen cracked eggs. Nothing but a deep sense of wrong could have induced the man to bring them from home, for the most heartless person would have admitted that they were too far gone already.

"Those are nice things to put in your window and label fresh eggs, ain't they?" interrogated the man in a sarcastic way. "I'd just like to know what excuse you can make."

"When did you buy them?" asked the grocer after chewing the ends of his mustache awhile.

"Last night."

"I thought there was a mistake somewhere," replied the grocer, with a returning smile on his face. "It was your own blame, sir. These eggs were as fresh as daisies when I labeled them a fortnight ago."—New York Evening Sun.

AFTER FORTY.

After forty, locks grow thinner,
We grow stouter—there's the rub!
Linger longer o'er our dinner,
Shirk the matutinal tub.
After forty we get lazy,
To the lads the girls resign—
They may flirt with Dot and Daisy
Whilst we loiter o'er our wine!

After forty we discover
Aches and pains distinctly new.
Once a lobster salad lover,
Now we court the homely stew!
After forty fidgets find us,
Sad to tell, an easy prey,
Leaving lightsomeness behind us
We grow graver day by day!

After forty, saucy misses
Treat us like their own papas;
No fear now of stolen kisses;
Billets doux—irate mammas!
But, their white arms calmly resting
On our shoulders, if you please,
They will ask (I am not jesting)
After our rheumatic knees!

After forty we're approaching
Fogeydom—so Ethel thinks;
And we growl at naught encroaching
On our precious forty winks.
O'er a stile we crawl with caution,
We, once agile as a roe;
For life's autumn is our portion,
And its spring went long ago!

After forty, graybeards claim us
Quite as one of them—ah me!
Men of sixty thus defame us—
We are only forty-three!
Old Jim Crow, too, scrawls with pleasure
After forty on our phiz!
Time who picks our locks at leisure,
Winks at wigs—the horrid quiz!

What's the moral of the matter?
This, and lay it well to heart—
After forty cease light chatter,
Act no more the stripling's part!
Let us take with resignation
In old fogies' ranks a place;
'Tis an art worth cultivation,
That of growing old with grace!

ALTAMAHA'S REWARD.

In the center of a circle of lodges was the chief, Tomo Chici, his eyes fixed with a peculiar meaning upon a captive who was seated near him.

The captive was a beautiful young girl bound with green thongs, and as she gazed upon these her lips curled in very scorn, and she gave utterance to words indicative of impatience.

"Do you fancy you will ever tame me?"

"We hope to do so."

"Then you hope in vain. I never can tolerate you or your barbarous customs."

"You will feel differently after a time. You will find many charms in our wild, free life, and when you become my wife"—

"Your wife!" shrieked the girl, something like a shudder passing over her frame.

"Yes, my wife. You must forget this Capt. Henry Waller, for by the Great Spirit I have sworn that you shall be mine."

Tomo Chici spoke fiercely, and turning from him the captive became silent.

When the morning dawned a savage yell aroused the camp and the chief sprang to his feet. A glance betrayed the fact that his captive had disappeared. Darting from his lodge he found one of his guard lying cold in death before it. It was the discovery of the body which had raised the alarm.

At the rear of the lodge the second guard, whose name was Altamaha, was soundly sleeping. At first the chief thought that he, too, had been slain; but the confusion aroused the savage, and springing to his feet he gazed wildly around him. He knew the penalty of his negligence, and he trembled when he contemplated his position. He had reason to do so, for at the command of Tomo Chici he was instantly seized and firmly bound.

A savage was found without the circle of lodges in a dying condition. He could speak with difficulty, and he stated that he had been aroused during the night by low whisperings and the sounds of footsteps. He left his lodge only to receive a knife in his breast, and fell senseless. The avenger wore a scarlet coat, and Helen Prescott, the captive, was in his company. A search was made around the camp, and half a mile distant there were the marks where three horses had been tied to trees. They had evidently come from Savannah, and had taken their departure in that direction. The chief knew that pursuit was useless, and he returned to his lodge foaming with rage and bent upon vengeance. For a year he had been engaged in a plot for the capture of Helen Prescott; for he had seen her in Savannah, and becoming enamored of her had resolved to abduct the maiden and make her his queen. All his plans had failed, however; but at length his son, a young chief, called Red Plume, had penetrated the city in the disguise of a British officer and succeeded in bringing the maiden away captive. She had been but two days among the Indians when she made her escape.

As soon as Tomo Chico returned to his camp he ordered Altamaha to be bound to a stake, and brushwood was heaped around him preparatory to burning. The savage had recovered his self possession. He was a brave fellow, and had always stood high in the estimation of his leader.

Turning to his chief he said: "I know that I deserve death for sleeping, but if my chief will spare me I will bring back the captive maiden."

For a moment the chief remained silent, and then replied: "You shall do more. Bring me the maiden and tell me that her lover, Capt. Henry Waller, is dead. Bring me, as an evidence of the fact, his scalp and his scarlet coat. Do this and your life shall be spared."

Altamaha promised that it should be done, and he was released. He started immediately in the direction of Savannah.

There was great excitement in Savannah when it was known that Miss Prescott had so mysteriously disappeared, and none partook of this feeling more strongly than did the young English captain, Henry Waller, her betrothed husband. He believed the savages were connected with the matter, and he at once communicated his suspicions to Gen. Oglethorpe, the governor and commander of the post. The general could not think as did the lover, and he hesitated when asked for troops. Should they advance upon the Indian settlement the treaty would thus be broken, and a bloody warfare might be the result.

He said to the captain, however, "Take as many men as you require, and approach within five miles of the Indian camp. There you must halt until you yourself have advanced and found that your suspicions are correct. In that case you have discretionary power; but act with prudence."

At the head of fifty dragoons Waller advanced. Reaching the designated spot he halted his men and then rode forward with a single orderly leading a third horse. Approaching within half a mile of the camp he dismounted and advanced alone. Silently he entered the circle of lodges and crept to the one most prominent among the number, believing it to be occupied by the chief. He listened and heard a murmur as if uttered in sleep. His heart beat wildly, for he recognized the voice of his idol.

Before the lodge a guard was seated, but he appeared half asleep. It was an easy matter to dispatch him, and then the captain crawled slowly into the lodge. Swiftly but cautiously they passed along, and were only interrupted by a single savage, who shared the fate of the guard. The horses were reached and soon they joined the main body and rapidly rode for Savannah.

Young Red Plume had been abroad that night, still wearing his disguise. Suddenly he came in sight of the dragoons where they were waiting. Soon he discovered that the maiden had been rescued, and as the cavalcade rode by he joined them. The darkness and his disguise were his protection and he determined to recapture Helen. Chance favored him.

After a time the light hearted girl bantered her companions for a race, and without awaiting a reply darted forward at a furious rate. The Indian followed her, and soon the two had far outstripped the others. A bend in the road shut them altogether from view. The horse on which Helen was riding stumbled and fell, and she was rendered insensible. Now was the golden opportunity, and Red Plume was not slow to take advantage of it. He caught the maiden in his arms and carried her into the woods flanking the roadway, leading both horses after him. In a few moments he heard the dragoons pass, not one of them entertaining the least suspicion that harm had befallen the maiden. The savage laughed in fiendish glee.

Placing Helen upon a mossy bank he watched beside her until she had recovered, and then lashing her to one of the horses he began his return toward the camp. It was evident that she had been considerably injured, for after proceeding a few miles she fainted.

Red Plume rode into an undergrowth so dense that it almost shut out the daylight. He paused by a silver spring which had been reached by a narrow, winding pathway. Lifting the captive from the animal upon which she had been bound he took her in his arms, seated himself by the fountain and began to bathe her brow with the cooling liquid.

In the meantime Altamaha had reached that point on his way to Savannah. He turned also to quench his thirst and discovered the Indian and the maiden. The disguise deceived him. There was the crimson coat, and he believed the wearer to be Henry Waller. His heart throbbed with fiendish delight, and, creeping slowly forward, he plunged his tomahawk into his brain.

Then he tore the scarlet coat from his body and cut the scalp from Red Plume's head. With the maiden and his trophies he rode proudly back, and advancing toward Tomo Chico laid the coat at his feet with the gory scalp.

The chief looked at it, started, and turning his flashing eyes upon Altamaha exclaimed in tones choking with passion, while the warrior quivered with dread:

"Whitehearted dog and fool! You have brought me the coat of my son. Die, cursed wretch!"

He drew his tomahawk from his belt and hurled it forward with great force. It buried itself deep into the brains of Altamaha, and he then fell lifeless to the ground.

The grief of Tomo Chico was very great. He led his captive into his lodge and then seated himself. He did not speak, but an occasional groan burst from his lips and his powerful breast heaved violently. Hours passed on and still no orders had been given for a night guard. Suddenly the yelling of his warriors aroused him. He sprang without his lodge and listened. He heard the rattle of arms and the tramp of horses' feet. He quickly began the formation of his warriors; but now a body of dragoons burst into the circle and the fight began.

In half an hour after Helen Prescott was on her way back to Savannah with the troopers. She rode beside her lover, and this time felt no inclination to indulge in a race. The lesson the savages had received was a salutary one, and the chief was glad to enter into another treaty of peace, for his broken faith had cost him dearly.

Helen Prescott soon after became the wife of young Waller and reigned sole queen of his heart.—New York World.

Phosphates in Food.

A deal of rubbish has been written about phosphates in food. What is certain is this, however, that in the finest qualities of flour, from which the best bread is made, there is a slight deficiency in phosphate of calcium. The outer portion of the grain contains more phosphate than the inner part. Somebody has printed that "the quantity of phosphate of calcium contained in living beings is proportioned to their activity," but whether this activity is a physical or mental one is not mentioned. It does seem that the phosphates in food do not go to make bone entirely, but are used in other parts of the human economy.—New York Times.

Care of Books.

A lover of books will always take good care of them. He never holds the book by the corner of the cover, never turns down leaves, never lays the book down open, either with the face downward or on its back, and never breaks the binding by opening the book too forcibly. He turns the leaves one by one, taking great care not to soil or tear them, and uses the volume gently. It makes no difference if the book be cheap or worn he always handles it gently.—Jewish Messenger.

A Sign of Rain.

Among our scientific scraps we find a statement that to the inhabitants of Lebbeke, Belgium, the hearing of certain small bells four or five miles away is a sure indication of rain. One bell, about six miles distant, is heard twice a year—in March or April and in September or October—and always during the same atmosperic conditions. M. de Ridder finds that not only does moisture favor the transmission of sound, but the contrary winds are not always an obstacle.

GENIUS AND SUCCESS.

Genius in Art Is No Better Paid in Dollars Than in the Old Days.

Formerly it was an opinion generally accepted that genius could not exist long with a turn of affairs. To "gnaw a crust in a garret" was looked upon as the natural and fitting thing for a poet to do while spinning the golden cocoon of art. Times have changed, and we have changed with them to such a degree that nowadays the muses are expected to endow a genius with the knack of turning a shilling as adroitly as he is expected to turn the stylus or wield the plectrum. Art, and especially literary art, is at this moment of all arts the surest in financial footing; in other words, the literary genius is better paid than any other worker in a purely artistic vocation, and yet it is not a hundred years since the days of his starvation.

We hear a good deal about the unreliability of literature as a profession, but the bottom fact in the matter is that the profession is as reliable as any other to those who can master it as a business. In the business of letters there is no way of avoiding scrutiny and exposure. All the world is the writer's critic. It is not so with the physician; he can look wise, pour out three drops of sweetened water, feel his patient's pulse and go his way. Even the lawyer has many a short cut by which he can escape detection when he blunders, but the writer must meet every demand or he must fall.

A moment or two of careful thinking will disclose to any mind the element which distinguishes literary and art life from every other field of human experience and aspiration. To succeed in the best sense of any calling you must have genius, but success today is measured by money, and we may as well for the moment take the best possible view of this criterion—the golden yardstick. We may take it as a general rule that every person entering upon the profession of literature has in view two things—fame and money, with a heavy balance of preference to the credit of the latter.

In this view of the case can we safely say that genius succeeds better than mere agile and clever talent? Take the successful novels, for example, published during the year, and what will be the impression? With one exception, the most popular and paying novels of recent issue have been of poor workmanship and have appealed to human sympathy through other channels than art; but they have been written by men and women of genius who were willing to cater to a vulgar taste for the sake of success. The reader who runs is not apt to make note of this clever, if debasing, trick of the literary profession, nor is it our purpose to analyze it. What we have in mind is to point out why it is that writers have a harder time of it than other professional people.

Some one has said that genius is patience, but the saying will not hold when applied to the irritable, restless, insatiable knights of the pen. The time has passed when the poet, the novelist or the essayist was content to delve for the applause of posterity. Success must be immediate or some other string must be pulled; fame and money forthwith is the demand, but if fame can not be had, then notoriety and money, money at all events.

We called attention not long ago to the system of literary "booming," which is but a part of the general scheme in which literary effort has involved itself of late. Even genius has been "hustled" into to it to such an extent that one regards askance every sudden apparition above the literary horizon.

To set our own opinion in plain words, we seriously doubt whether genius in art is better paid today than it was in the time of the garret and the crust, save where it truckles to mere popular demand. The money making genius watches the weathervane of current taste as a broker watches the movements of financial weathercocks and strikes for the lucky lead. He deals in literary margins, he bulls or bears the market, he takes a chance on every change of the wind. Perhaps this is why there are so few genuine creations in literature at present.

The poet writes to suit the needs of the magazine editors, so likewise does the prose writer, and in this way journalism is shaping both men and literature. Genius is no longer "proud and fond of savage liberty," or if it is the exigencies of a life overpressed with the weight of artificial needs and dazzled by the glare of gold shut out the possibility of entertaining lofty ambitions. The French, the English and the American authors seem to be in a mad chase after great incomes, rather than in search of the muses. Genius succeeds, but at a loss, no matter what are its receipts in bills and checks.—Chautauquan.

The Princess Louise, who for the past ten years has presided over an art school in Sloane street, London West, is the first English woman to employ Irish needle women. She saw fit to secure that talent on account of its superior qualification, and in a sweet and diplomatic way grouped the sewers together for class instruction or to fill orders. It will be remembered that from this school of needle painting nearly all of the now famous schools originated. The princess received her scholastic education from her father, and aside from her intellectual attainments she is gifted as an artist, sculptress and art designer.

The Thumb an Index to Character.

The way in which the thumb is held is a true sign of character. The man who turns it in under his fingers is always weak. That is the position in which it is always held by a child. The thumbs of great men are large and point out conspicuously from their fellow members.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

JUST WHAT IS WANTED.

Business is alive to a great coming event, and in the hurly-burly of its preparations for the Columbian Exposition in 1893, too much is already seen on the streets of a fanciful or amusing nature, both superficial and catch-penny. There has been observed a void in the line of the strictly useful, combining therewith instructive object lessons and the beautiful in art. Books there may be by the score, but the experience of the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia shows that the mass of these were mere trifles and unserviceable. The horde of visitors were ever at loss for a handy pocket guide of official stamp, not only reliable, but pleasing and always fit to keep. Just what is wanted of this unique kind has happily already made its appearance, and we have before us "THE OFFICIAL PORTFOLIO OF THE WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION," illustrated from Water Color Drawings.

This Portfolio is a rare and beautiful exponent of the main architectural features of the Great Exposition at Chicago in 1893. The fourteen magnificent structures are faithfully exhibited, while the Bird's-eye View gives a realistic glance at the lay of the grounds, with their principal buildings, lagoons, etc. The illustrations are exact reproductions, in water color effects, of the original drawings, made especially for this purpose from the official plans, by America's best known water color artist, Charles Graham. A copy of this exceptionally fine production will be sent to any address upon receipt of 10 cents in postage stamps by The Charles A. Vogeler Co., Baltimore, Md.

INFERIOR GOODS.

The only safe way for purchasers is to insist on having the genuine article, and not allow themselves to be swindled by having plasters said to be "just as good," or "containing superior ingredients," imposed upon them. These are only tricks to sell inferior goods that no more compare with ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS than copper does with gold. One trial of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS will convince the most skeptical of their merits.

The eminent Henry A. Mott, Jr., Ph.D., F. C. S., late Government Chemist, certifies: "My investigation of ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER shows it to contain valuable and essential ingredients not found in any other plaster, and I find it superior to and more efficient than any other plaster."

Ask for ALLCOCK'S, and let no solicitation or explanation induce you to accept a substitute.

THAT DEAR OLD WORD, GOOD-BY,

Is a mighty sad one when it is the parting salutation between friends whom thousands of miles of salt water are about to separate. Mariners, buyers in foreign lands for heavy houses, commercial travelers who have made many trips across the stormy Atlantic, think little of an ocean voyage, but to the first voyager the initial trip is a momentous affair. Sea sickness is to be expected as a matter of course. How to prevent it? The finest remedy and preventive of the nausea provoked by the tossing of a vessel, the jarring motion of the screw of a steamship, or of a locomotive train, is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, pronounced by sea captains, ship doctors, tourists, travelers and emigrants the finest stomachic and best defense against ailments of the bowels, digestive organs and liver in existence. Malaria, rheumatism, kidney trouble and debility are remedied by it.

THE MOUFFLON.

A Curious Animal That Resembles Rocky Mountain Wild Sheep.

ITS HORNS USED AS AIR CUSHIONS

A Strange Beast From Southern Europe and Asia That Can See the Wind or the Scent of a Man.

The keepers in the Central park menagerie are all men of considerable intelligence, and many of them hold valuable and entertaining theories regarding the animals under their charge. It is not easy for an outsider to learn what these theories are, but they come out gradually on better acquaintance. They are usually the result of long experience worked upon by a bold imagination.

Keeper Holmes, who has looked after deer and camels for about twenty-six years, propounds some of the most valuable of these theories.

There are in the deer house a male and a female Sardinian mouflon. By the way, the keepers do not speak of a male or a female animal, but of a lady or a gentleman animal. For instance, they say "That's a lady hippopotamus," or "That's a gentleman hippopotamus."

One Friday the lady mouflon presented her gentleman with a new small mouflon of the male sex.

The baby mouflon was seen by the writer soon after his appearance in this world. He is well cared for by his mother. He is very small and very plump. His mother is an extremety affectionate animal, and puts a warm, damp nose against the hand of anybody who puts it within her cage.

The mouflon is the subject of one of Keeper Holmes' theories. The animal is variously called the Sardinian or the Corsican mouflon, or the muffle, and scientifically the ovis musimon. It is a sheep, and one of the many varieties of wild sheep.

HOW THE ANIMAL APPEARS.

The specimens in Central park stand a little more than two feet high and are very gracefully formed. They have not the goatlike tuft under the chin possessed by some wild sheep.

The mouflon is found in the mountains of Sardinia, Corsica, Southern Spain, European Turkey and in various Mediterranean islands. It closely resembles the Rocky mountain wild sheep, but is prettier.

The mouflon has wool and hair like any other sheep. The wool comes next to the skin and the hair outside thewool. As everybody should know the great difference between wild and domesticated sheep is that the former have more hair and less wool, and the latter less hair and more wool. The wool is developed and the hair decreases after domestication.

The mouflon's wool is of a yellowish white and his hair of a light chestnut color. It is gray on the muzzle, the abdomen and the inner side of the thighs, and white on the under side of the tail. The hair grows thinner in summer.

The mouflon has a very bumpy forehead just over the eyes. Its head is long and intelligent looking. Its muzzle is compressed.

The gentleman mouflon has immense, hollow horns. They are triangular. They bend backward in a semicircle, and take another small twist before they come to points. The bases of the horns occupy almost the entire forehead above the bumpy part mentioned.

There is something very interesting connected with these horns. The mouflon is one of the most difficult animals to shoot or catch. He is very timid, very swift, and can take refuge in places inaccessible to man. His horns serve him for defense very seldom, however, and principally as a means of escape.

TRUSTS TO HIS HORNS.

The mouflon can see the wind or the scent of a man coming—in what way will be explained later. It is his custom to stand on the edge of a precipice and watch the approaching wind or foe. When he thinks it time to get out of the way he takes a dive, apparently to his inevitable destruction. As a matter of fact, he alights on his immense horns, which causes him to bounce off the ground a few feet into the air. Then he alights comfortably on his feet.

One veracious sportsman relates that he had got within easy shooting distance of a mouflon when the animal took his customary dive. Great was the sportsman's surprise when, after a few minutes, he saw the mouflon reappear on the spot whence he had dived.

In his fear the mouflon had taken such a hard dive that he bounded back to exactly the place which he had left. Then the sportsman shot him easily, of course. The mouflon has a remarkably fine and large blue eye. It is with this that Keeper Holmes' theory is connected.

The eyes are situated at the side of the head, and, not unnaturally, are very wide apart. The animal can look in front, to the side and behind without moving his head. Of this there is no possible doubt whatever.

Keeper Holmes says that the mouflon can see the wind, which has a red color to him and varies in redness according to its velocity. The fact that he is afraid of anything red goes to prove this. All animals, says Mr. Holmes, which can see the wind are timid, and so should we be if we could do so. Can it be that this theory would account for the mental distress of gentlemen who see things which others cannot? The mouflon, according to Mr. Holmes, can see other sights and smell other smells of which we are entirely unconscious.

It should be said that he is borne out more or less in his theory by scientists. Sir John Lubbock has recently found out that his ants are conscious of several colors unknown to men. The same thing is true of many other animals in regard to smells.—New York Evening Sun.

Two contradictory names are those of the president and the secretary of the National Association of Letter Carriers, which recently held a convention at Indianapolis. The name of the president is Dennis, and the name of the secretary is Victory.

About Salad Dressing.

Every one in New York who eats salad thinks that there are a few people in town who can make a fairly good salad dressing, but that none of them can come up to the drsssings made by him (the thinker).

"I tell you, sir," said Boggs, the gourmand, as he deluges the lettuce with grease, "that fellow Snoggs thinks he knows how to do this, but he doesn't have any more idea of it than a cow. Think of it, he puts in more vinegar than oil!"

At the same moment Snoggs is mixing a dressing in another part of town and snickering to himself as he remarks: "I was very much amused the other night at the way Boggs did this. He actually made a dressing without vinegar! Ha! Ha!" and every one laughed.

Then there is Juggins, of West Thirty-fourth street, who also has his peculiar views. "Any man," he declares, "who puts mustard in a salad shows his ignorance."

Muggins, of East Sixty-seventh street, also has decided convictions. "What do you think," he roars out; "I saw Juggins putting mustard in a salad dressing."

Then some put in sugar. Others think this an awful absurdity. A few use a dab of Worcestershire sauce. Others would rather be lynched than follow their example.

The funny thing is that there is only one way to make a salad dressing. That is the way known to the reader of this article.

But the funniest thing is that the same diner out will devour the dressing made by Boggs and join in with his jokes at the expense of the dressings made by Snoggs, Muggins and Juggins. Then the same man will eat at the table of Muggins and apparently sneer with that person at the efforts of Snoggs, Boggs and Juggins.

There's a lot of conceit and deceit about salad dressings.—New York Herald.

A Really Absentminded Woman.

An absentminded woman put herself on record the other morning in a cross town car, which she boarded at Sixth avenue, bound east. She paid her fare, said "Third avenue" to the conductor, took a second nickel for her ticket on the elevated, and, shutting her purse, gave herself over to some evidently absorbing thought.

The car was full of changing people, as is usual with crosstown cars, and a moment later the conductor, making his round again, noticed the nickel and mechanically reached for it. The woman gave it to him without a word and rode on. Near Fourth avenue she suddenly started out of her reflections, glanced around, saw that she was near her destination, took out a third nickel to have it ready and once more knit her brows in meditation. Before Third avenue was reached the conductor passed her again. This time she proffered him the nickel, which he would stolidly have taken save for the intervention of an old gentleman seated opposite.

"Madam," he said, "you have already paid your fare twice."

The woman started and looked confused, then a light dawned on her face, she thanked the gentleman, put her nickel into her purse and the purse deep into a mysterious pocket somewhere in the back of her dress just as Third avenue was reached. When last seen she was hurrying up the stairs struggling to fish the purse out in search of the heretofore too convenient nickel.—New York Times.

They Found the Indians.

One night in the tent I heard a cowboy tell this story: He was with a big outfit moving cattle, and one day, somewhere near the line separating Colorado from New Mexico, they encountered a settler's cabin which had been plundered by Indians. The settler and his wife and children had been killed. The foreman was sent for, and he immediately ordered that the cattle be allowed to take care of themselves while the cowboys went after the Indians. Three parties set out at once, one commanded by the foreman and the other two by experienced men. One party came back in a day without finding any trace of the Indians.

Another party came back in two days without finding any trace of the Indians, but at the end of the third day the third party came back whooping and yelling and firing off their pistols, they had found the Indians, killed every one of them and captured their ponies.—Cor. Topeka Capital.

The Ice Invasion.

On both sides of the Atlantic equally, the intercalation of fossilized forests bears authentic witness to the sweeping over the land of two great waves of ice invasion. The trees manifestly grew where the glaciers had been; again the glaciers crept forward to constitute themselves the sepulchers of the trees. The second advance, however, fell short of the first, and succeeded it at an unknown interval of time. Opinions are much divided as to its true significance. Dr. Wright inclines to connect the "forest beds" with merely partial oscillations of the ice front.—Edinburgh Review.

Fences in England.

English bar fences have the appearance of being bottom side up—somewhat as an X looks when inverted. But it is all right; lumber is scarce there, and it isn't necessary to have the bars so close together up where the horses and cattle are as down where the sheep and pigs would be tempted to crawl through.—New York Sun.

Miss Pretti—N-o, I believe she and my mother had some sort of a quarrel when they were girls.—New York Weekly.

WHAT IS IT?

Mysterious and Remarkable Power Over Men Possessed by a Woman.

STRONG MEN UNABLE TO MOVE HER.

She Can Easily Resist the Combined Strength of a Dozen People.—A Wonderful Exhibition.

A few days since I chanced to be where that remarkable woman Mrs. Lulu Abbott (so I have heard her called; I didn't notice the bills) was exhibiting her wonderful powers. I went to see her public exhibitions, had a private interview with her and must truly say that she nonplused me, as she did every one that saw her.

At one exhibition where I saw her there were six or seven gentlemen on the stage with her—gentlemen who represented the business intelligence and acumen of the place, a clergyman and several physicians who represent the highest attainments and skill in their line. These were invited there to examine, criticise and try by every means in their power and knowledge to find out what was the source of the remarkable powers of this little woman.

Mrs. Abbott is a small and pretty woman. Her normal weight is from ninety-five to ninety-eight pounds. She is of delicate complexion and of the simple ingenuous manners of a child. She is about 35 years old, and she finds herself possessed of a most remarkable power to overcome any physical life or animal power that may be brought to bear against her. She knows nothing of what this power is. She is not aware that she makes any effort of will-concentration of thought, certainly not of muscular thought, to perform the wonderful feats of what we call strength that she performed by the dozen before audiences made up from the best, wisest and best educated people of the place.

LIFTING SIX MEN.

For instance, half a dozen of the gentlemen on the stage piled one upon another on one—again upon two chairs that were on the stage, and she, standing behind the chair and touching lightly the wood of the back of the chair, would instantly lift the chair and all those men from the floor. She barely touches the chair, passes her hand and fingers along the upright posts as a musician runs his fingers lightly over the keys of a piano or guitar to see if it be in tune or to find the dominant tone or chord in the piece he is about to play; or, it seemed to me the most like this of anything, that she was seeking "the dominant seventh."

Again, six men took a billiard cue, and standing it upright on the floor, with their hands clasping it tightly near the top, another man, the heaviest and strongest perhaps of all on the stage, with Mrs. Abbott, mounted to the top and sat upon the top, the hands of the six other holders of the cue forming a kind of seat for him to sit upon. The cue began to bend as though it would break, when she touched it lightly with her delicate fingers, passing them lightly over it as along the strings of a guitar, when it at once straightened, and clasping it in the most light and delicate manner, and apparently putting forth not one least effort or strength, she lifted the cue half a foot from the floor against all the force these six men and one on the top could exert to keep it down.

Again, standing upon one foot on the floor, not the force of the strongest man or any two men could pull or push her from her position.

Calling a little boy from the audience she passed her hands lightly over his hands and arms a moment, and he was firmly set against the power of all these men as she had been. Twisting a handkerchief that some one handed her into a kind of ring she and the little boy both took hold of it with no apparent strength except merely to hold it, and the little boy stood as immovable as a mountain against all the attempts of one or two or more men (as many as could reach the child) to move him from the floor.

SHE MAKES NO EFFORT.

So standing with her hands pressed so lightly against the door casings that she held an egg under the palm of each hand and did not crush it all the strength of as many men as could reach her could not pull her from her position. This feat she tried many times, and sometimes placing her hands over the hands of one of the gentlemen, who himself held the egg under his hands, and one of these gentlemen who assisted in this feat assured me that he felt but the slightest touch of her hand upon his and no pressure whatever to indicate any effort put forth on her part.

Indeed she makes no effort. She says she is not conscious of putting forth any will power or aiming at any concentration of thoughts. The effort does not tire her in the least. Again, she took the cue in her hands, so lightly holding it—it really lying on one of her hands rather than her clasping it—one, two, three and even six men together tried to wrest this from off her hands rather than in them, and they were as powerless to do this as would be a fly lighting upon the rod. The power would seem to be a current that in passing through her is arrested for this application in some way that she as little understands as any one else. Normally she is very delicate, and can lift only very light weights. "This power," she said, "does not help in the least to do my work about the house; I wish it did," for she can with it only lift or move things that have animal life in them.

She found herself possessed of this power when she was a child, when annoying her father in playing about his chair. He told her if she did not stop he would put her away from him. She said it came to her to say to him, "You can't put me away." He tried to lift and carry her off, and found himself powerless to lift the child. An older brother then tried to put this child, only 7 years old, out the door, and could not stir her from her standing place on the floor. She is conscious of no peculiar feeling except a kind of tremor passing through her arms. Holding a glass tumbler between her hands one may hear a loud musical whirring and every second or so a click like that of telegraphing. In conversation nothing is more apparent than that she is entirely sincere and simple as a child. She would like as well as any one to know what this strange power is and whence it comes to her.—Cor. Detroit Tribune.

"Why, yesterday evening I was calling on her, and during the evening I remarked that if she wished I would tell her of a little incident, adding that it had just crossed my mind."

"What did she say?"

"She merely looked at me and remarked: 'Did it have far to travel, Mr De Jay?'"

"That was unkind. Did you make any reply?"

"No, but I looked real grieved."—Merchant Traveler.

The Evils of White Flannel.

A white flannel suit is becoming to some men, comfortable this weather for any man, and it is one of those æsthetic cases which gem the desert of monotony in masculine attire. But the white flannel suit despite its dazzling luster and its coolness has its drawbacks.

The other day a young man, whom I do not know, attracted my attention by the sheen of his raiment. He wore a white flannel suit, and in the blazing sunshine he walked an exception to the rule, a cool looking man. I was behind him, but as he strolled along the street slowly I gradually caught up with him As I came close I noticed that a black line extended across the back of his coat diagonally from his left shoulder. A strange place to put a seam and so conspicuously, I thought.

The black line, like a fly on a bald man's head, fascinated me. As I drew closer and closer to it I was puzzled still more, for I discovered that the line was wavy and abruptly ended about three inches from the edge of the sack coat. Then all at once I recognized the true nature of the line—it was long, rippling black hair!

All that be needed is that a man who wears a white flannel suit should confine his attentions to blondes.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

His Hair Like a Circassian Girl's.

Charles R. Cummins, of Montague, Lewis county, is a freak, in that he has a head of hair like that of the Circassian girl of side show fame, and is going to join a circus. Mr. Cummins is a son of Foss Cummins, and was born on Oct. 10, 1852. He has always resided in Lewis county and is a farmer by occupation. His hair, unlike that of his four brothers, has always been very heavy and curly, and for this reason has been kept closely cut. Six months ago a lady friend persuaded him to let his hair grow to a suitable length, in order that she might be provided with frizzes that would not have to undergo the curling iron process occasionally. Inside of three months the hair had grown about three inches and was hard to manage, but the growth was allowed to continue, and now the hair will average seven inches in length. It is, in all respects, as before stated, similar to that of the Circassian girl, and Mr. Cummins being unable to find a hat large enough, is compelled to go bareheaded. The hair is as fine as silk, dark brown in color and inclined to curl.—Rome Sentinel.

Salutation Is Enough This Weather.

A down town physician advises: During the hot weather we are having now people should be careful with whom they shake hands. The moisture from one hand may possess the poison from a disease. The pores of the skin are open and this poison may be communicated easily. There isn't much sense in this indiscriminate hand shaking, anyway. The Americans indulge too much in the habit. We shake hands with every stranger to whom we may be introduced, and shake hands again five minutes later on separation. We perhaps never see the person again, and have no interest in that person beyond being civil out of compliment to the one who introduces. This indiscriminate handshake is a nuisance, and besides, as I said at the start, it is dangerous this sort of weather.—Chicago Tribune.

Cisterns.

After a summer drought all water tanks and cisterns should be examined, and if need be repaired; but in every instance well and carefully cleansed before being allowed to fill up again with water. Mischief is done and disease induced and propagated by the use of bad water, because the sediment, if not washed out, becomes mingled with every fresh influx of water. A very general and most virulent and fatal epidemic of diphtheria and severe attacks of typhoid fever have been known to be produced by the neglect of this essential duty. The necessity for frequent cleansing of cisterns cannot be too strongly insisted on.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Fruit Instead of Flowers.

"Send fruit to your departing friends on steamers instead of flowers," said the purser of an Atlantic flyer. "Fruit is never so delicious as when eaten on the water, and with the new refrigerators it can be kept perfectly fresh from shore to shore. The flowers wither over night, and are tossed overboard as soon as possible after their fragrance has been sucked up by the salty air."—New York World.

Just What He Wanted.

Gus De Smith—I wish I had appealed for a postoffice, or clerkship, or something of the kind.

Ferguson—What good would that have done you? You would have been left out in the cold.

De Smith (mopping his perspiring brow)—My dear boy, that's precisely what I want.—Texas Siftings.

Francis Bennoch, whose death is announced in London, was well known in New York and Boston. He was a business man, with literary tastes, and was Hawthorne's intimate friend. He was Julian Hawthorne's godfather, and knew Longfellow, Bryant, Bayard Taylor and Emerson.

In a water telephone recently patented in England, the apparatus employed for the collection of sound transmitted through water between ships has been improved by constructing an apparatus so that any pressure caused by the increased density of the water has no effect upon it.

This year's caterpillar stories are not quite so large as those of two years ago, but they say that a train on the Bangor and Piscataquis railroad was nearly stopped by the bugs the other day, and that some of the white birch trees in that region are fairly alive with them.

A prize of $100 was offered by The Washington Post to the person guessing nearest the population of that city, and, remarkable to say, three persons hit exactly the number, 229,796. They have agreed to divide the money.

A JOLLY WIZARD.

Oh a wizard dwelt in a cave by the sea,
And a dreamer of dreams was he,
The wild waves' roar as they broke on the shore,
Gave him mirth and jollity.
For he'd people the rocks and the sounding deep
With phantasies weird as the products of sleep.

Oh, he dreamed of a maiden fair as a star,
Who came o'er the rolling sea
On the snowy crest of the billow's breast;
With airy head walked she,
And her face was as white as the driven snow,
And her voice was like music sad and low.

Oh, she sang of love, and of lovers' pain,
And she sang of a dream so sweet
That had urged her soul to a desperate goal,
For the sake of a wild heart beat,
For the lover she loved in her fondest dream
Was false as the glitter of brook and stream.

Oh, the wizard dwelt in a cave by the sea,
And a dreamer of dreams was he,
Through phantasies sad and phantasies glad,
He kept his jollity;
"For a dream is a dream, and not life," quoth he,
"But love which is life ne'er a dream can be."

—Washington Star.

AN ECCENTRIC HEIRESS.

Over the long brown level of the landscape the pink coats made vivid spots. The gray uppiled clouds parted here and there, giving passage to silver lances of slanting light. There was a sea wind at large, but it was tempered by intermediate spaces of sandbar and of dead stretch of meadow grass, shriveled and dry.

The hunt was over. The wind blew up more keenly.

"It's veering to the east," said the young man who rode at Miss Brockton's side, and who had managed to keep near her from start to finish. "Fortunate we had such a capital day. There'll be rain to-morrow."

Nothing original in the remarks. But then why expect originality? Mr. Thomas Ashington Revery was a good looking youth, who sat his mount well and was quite faultless in the matter of coats and collars, nails and hands and boots. What more could one ask?

But Miss Geraldine Brockton appeared to have an attitude of asking the absurd, the impossible. Had she not owned a million in her own right such peculiarities as hers—such marked, curious ways of looking at things and doing things—would really have seemed in questionable form. She was even as unseizable at every point as those long rays of silver white light that filtered through the clouds and melted and was gone again as you looked. Here, a few minutes ago, with the glad blood in her cheeks caused by the rapid motion, she had seemed vivid, animated, pleased with herself, with life, with her companion, perhaps. And now that the latter had simply uttered a word or two in a softer strain she had stiffened and frozen, abruptly, unapproachably.

"D— the whims of women!" said Thomas Ashington Revery to himself. "How is one to make headway with such a girl as this?"

When Miss Brockton had dismounted at her own door she went straight into the pretty room where sat her chaperone, relative and companion, Mrs. Gwynne, making tea.

This lady glanced up, caught the look in the girl's eye and said:

"What has Mr. Revery been doing?"

"Doing?" Miss Brockton's magnificent eyes flashed fire. "Do you suppose I care what that—creature does?"

"If you don't care for him he cares for you."

"For me!" Geraldine laughed with ineffable scorn. "For my money, you mean!"

So that was the trouble again. Mrs. Gwynne had perceived at once that the girl was in one of her "moods."

"I shall advise you, Geraldine, to rid yourself of that prepossession of yours. You are grown morbid on the subject. You are quite capable of being liked for yourself, even if you are an heiress. Be reasonable. I suppose you are not prepared to be an old maid? Then don't ask too much of men."

Geraldine looked at her.

"I hate my money!" she said, with slow, vibrant intensity. "I hate it!"

"You would hate more being without it," observed Mrs. Gwynne, sipping her tea.

"You think so!" said the girl coldly. "You are mistaken"

She paused abruptly. A lad had burst into the room, followed by a young man, tall and dark. This was Eddy, Miss Brockton's brother and pet, and his tutor. The boy began to chatter away to his sister, but the tutor presently said:

"Come, my boy."

"Shall I give you a cup of tea, Mr. Severn?" asked Mrs. Gwynne.

"Thank you; no."

He was gone with the boy. Geraldine had not spoken. After a little she laughed:

"What a model tutor it is! How well he keeps to his place!"

Mrs. Gwynne flushed angrily.

"I wonder at you, Geraldine! There are times when you seem lacking not only in feeling but in good taste! Mr. Severn is a gentleman—a scholar! More of a gentleman and undoubtedly more of a scholar than any Gwynne of Brockton, perhaps!"

Geraldine turned a little pale.

"How very cutting! How you take Mr. Severn's part! Happy Mr. Severn!" Then, abruptly, without warning of any sort, she bridged the space between herself and the little Moorish stand, and Mrs. Gwynne, in deep surprise, felt the convulsive clasp of two strong young arms about her neck.

"Oh, Aunt Martha! Aunt Martha! Aunt Martha! Don't mind me! Don't scold me! I—I—I am unhappy! And in doubt! I am so tossed about! So—so"——

"Why—why—Geraldine!"

But the storm—or that phase of it, at least—had passed already. Geraldine drew herself up. She set her teeth, her lips.

"But I shall not be any longer. I am resolved! I shall know what to expect!"

Her eyes shone, a brilliant smile flashed over the traces of tears. She opened the door and vanished.

When Thomas Ashington Revery called the next day Mrs. Gwynne was constrained to tell him that Miss Brockton had gone to town.

"What! Already? She told me she expected to remain out until after the last meet!"

"Oh, she has only gone in for two or three days," Mrs. Gwynne hastened to explain. "She told me that she wished to see her lawyer and her guardian." Mrs. Gwynne smiled. "You know, she is a creature of moods."

Full well did Tom Revery know it! Did one ever see clearly how one stood with her? He departed crestfallen, inwardly fuming. She had seemed sometimes to like him well—very well, and she was certainly a very handsome girl, and he—well, he was undoubtedly in love with her; and there was the money! It appeared outrageous to the young man, whose own patrimony was less ample than he could have wished it, that a mere girl and a stripling should each have inherited such wealth. That was the stripling riding by now, and the tall, dark fellow with him was his tutor. It occurred to Tom Revery to wonder, in passing, whether the tutor ever saw much of his pupil's sister.

"Must be rather rough on the poor chap if he's susceptible at all!"

It was a week later, and Miss Brockton was not only at home this time, but had been sitting with Mr. Revery for nearly an hour.

There had now fallen over the room a heavy silence. It lasted only a few seconds, but the pause seemed an endless one. Miss Brockton had risen suddenly and was standing with an elbow against the mantel. As her visitor seemed helplessly to fumble for the fitting word she repeated a little nervously:

"I am sorry—very sorry—for this misunderstanding. But—I—cannot marry you, Mr. Revery. I shall never marry at all."

At this unlikely statement the suitor regained courage.

"Miss Brockton! Geraldine!"

"No; it is improbable that I should ever marry. Of course, many men might be tempted to propose to me, thinking me rich. But my property will soon, by my own desire, be so disposed of that I shall have only a moderate income. Even should I marry, my will is so made that nothing I have, in case of my death, would go to my husband. So you see, such considerations may act as deterrents."

"Miss Brockton, you — you cannot think, it is not possible that you would believe me"—Revery was turning, in rapid succession, from red to white, from white to red. The girl pitied his discomfiture.

"Not at all, Mr. Revery. I suspect you of no interested motives. But I do not care for you—in the way you mean."

Five minutes afterwards she was sitting by the fire alone, a scornful smile on her lips that presently faded away and into a sigh. Some one came in at the door as she sat there, but turned again, retreating. At the sound Geraldine glanced around.

"Don't go, Mr. Severn; let me tell you of an interview I have just had."

She had started to her feet again and stood in the attitude she had assumed a little before, with her arms resting on the chimney top. Dusk was coming on and the room was in a penumbra, save for the firelight. These leaping flames illuminated the face above them. Such a face! Arthur Severn felt dizzy for a moment. He had never seen her look like that. She had never flashed that smile, that eyebeam, upon him. She had never addressed him in that friendly, jesting tone. She was suddenly all life, all softness, all charm. She seemed to wish to atone for her sullenness, her arrogance. What a will o'-the-wisp she was! Changeful as a witch.

"An interview?' said the young man guardedly. He would not let himself go. He kept a tight rein on himself.

"With Mr. Revery; yes—fancy! I have all at once come to the conclusion that I wish to be married, if I am married at all, for myself. The heiress, Miss Brockton, will in a short time have practically ceased to exist and there will remain only Geraldine Brockton, with a small income. Well, I told Mr. Revery this. And would you believe it. He did not propose to Geraldine Brockton, though a moment before he had offered his hand and heart to Miss Brockten, the heiress!"

She was laughing now. Her eyes continued to flash upon him with that strange lambent persistence. It was almost like a challenge. What could she mean? Again Severn seemed to turn dizzy. He kept his outward composure by a tremendous effort.

"If what you say is true, Miss Brockton, you will regret it, perhaps."

"Regret giving nearly all my fortune to charitable institutions? Ah, you judge as the world judges, do you? I had thought differently of you, Mr. Severn. Why should I wish to be so rich?" she cried, with a sort of fierceness. "Other women may be able to stand the test. I could not. It was making me hard, suspicious. It was making me doubt the whole world. It was stifling me. I shall have enough left for all the decencies and comforts of life. And I am free! Yes, I am free now. Before I was a slave—a slave to flatterers, to fortune hunters, to every form of human hypocrisy. Other people may feel themselves exalted by such a position. I felt myself degraded!"

She stopped. She almost seemed to pant. The blood rushed to Severn's brain. He took a step forward. What was he about to do—what to say? Whatever it might have been, the portiere was drawn aside and Mrs. Gwynne came in. The words remained unuttered on his lips.

But Miss Brockton spoke. A strange spirit appeared to possess her, urging her on, goading her to abrupt disclosures.

"Ah, Aunt Martha! I wonder if you'll be surprised, too, at my news. I have made an announcement which has stricken two men dumb with astonishment already. And yet it does not seem so strange, does it? Mr. Severn seems scarcely to believe that I have given away nearly all my fortune."

"What nonsense!" said Mrs. Gwynne Severn had vanished.

"You do say such extraordinary things at times, declared Mrs. Gwynne. "People will really believe, at length, that you are not quite right, Geraldine."

"Aunt Martha!" Geraldine stood upright before her. "You don't believe me, either? It is true—true—! That was why I went to town to see the lawyer and"——

Mrs. Gwynne had fallen into a chair.

"What! Then all I have to say, Geraldine, is that you are insane! absolutely insane! Who ever heard of a girl giving away her fortune before?"

"Perhaps not, but"——

"You will regret this!"

Geraldine gave a strange, slightly bitter smile.

"I hope not!"

* * * * * * * *

"Jerry! Jerry!"

It was her younger brother's voice and it startled her from a fitful sleep. She started up confusedly. The boy called again. His room was just across the hall. An acrid odor of smoke touched her nostrils. Throwing on her wrapper and weak kneed with fear she threw herself against the door. The hall was dark. She opened the door of the boy's room—a dense cloud rose toward her and smote her in the face.

She cried out aloud—once, twice—for help and then uttered the boy's name. But there was no answer.

The fire, which had smoldered at first, now broke out fiercely.

"Eddy! Eddy!" cried the girl and threw herself into the room. She could see nothing. She was blinded—she could not breathe. She stumbled over a prostrate body.

"Eddy!" she stammered again.

Then she felt herself wrenched away by a strong arm, and some one had seized the boy's inanimate form and dragged it out of the room and her with it.

The next clear thing of which she was conscious was of a tongue of flame running up her pretty dressing gown and of being suddenly enveloped in Arthur Severn's coat, while this covering and his hands and arms stifled the just born blaze. They stood in the hall and the cloak—and the arms—were still around her and she was trembling in their clasp. Lights flashed out at the other end of the hall and people came rushing along it, and Mrs. Gwynne appeared, white and breathless.

"Merciful heaven!"

It was only a little fire, after all, started from the boy's bed-curtain having taken the blaze of a candle which he had left near it as he dropped asleep. It was not long before the lad had been restored to consciousness, the tattered curtains torn down, the charred bedding removed.

But Mrs. Gwynne did not regain her color. What was that she had seen? Should she ever forget it? Geraldine—Arthur Severn! Why, he had held her in his arms! He had held her in his arms and she had not seemed to struggle—she had not seemed to move!

All the next day Mrs. Gwynne went about in a sort of a dream. Finally, entering the drawing room at twilight, as she had done the day before, she staggered back. If there had been any doubt in the night there was no doubt now. Geraldine and Severn were there near the fire, very close together, and he was bending, bending down over the uplifted face.

"Aunt Martha!"

Arthur Severn started and stood upright. It is a man's misfortune never to look heroic thus caught in the act. But Geraldine only smiled a divine smile.

"Aunt Martha, Mr. Severn and I are to be married next month."

An hour later Mrs. Gwynne said:

"And so this was the reason for your giving up your money?"

"Yes. My money kept him away from me. And—I wanted, beside, to make sure that he loved me for myself. And he does! He does!"

Mrs. Gwynne looked at the radiant face for a long, silent minute.

"You are certainly," she observed, with slow deliberation, "the most eccentric girl I ever knew in my life!"

And Geraldine only laughed.—New York Mercury.

Oriental Ideas of Punctuality.

The indifference of time, characteristic of orientals, was illustrated in many amusing ways when first a railway was opened in a new part of India. Nothing but bitter experience could convince the natives that a train, unlike the bullock wagons they had been accustomed to, would not wait an indefinite time to pick up passengers. The deputy commissioner had on one occasion, shortly after the opening of a new line, sent his servant with his official letter bag to meet the train, and was much annoyed at seeing the man presently returning with it, having missed the train.

"You had not half a mile to go, and you knew that the train left the station at 3 o'clock!"

"Yes, truly, your majesty," replied the man in an aggrieved tone, "but when it strikes three here the train goes from there."

That was sharp practice of which he had no previous experience, and it was evident that he did not think it very creditable to the company.—Temple Bar.

Mr. Smith's Smile.

If a woman does not like a man, she can characterize him as no man ever could. A certain young man, Mr. Smith, was noted for an extraordinary and perennial smile. One of his lady schoolmates described a meeting with him thus: "As I was going out of church I saw a smile down by the door. When I came nearer I discovered that Mr. Smith was around it."—Christian Advocate.

Where India Ink Comes From.

India ink is made from burnt camphor and gum. The Chinese and Japanese are the only manufacturers of this ink. The process is a tedious one and requires great skill. The finer grades of India ink are delicately scented with attar of roses, and one stick about three inches long may cost four or five dollars. Age improves the ink.—Medical and Surgical Reporter.

The McKinley bill gave the vote of Ohio to Cleveland. This is beyond all others the most stinging rebuke to that enormity. McKinley was so great a man that he was much talked of as a candidate for the Presidency. Now he is like a blown bladder with all the wind let out of it

Since the final disappearance of the Whigs as a political party there has not been such a total collapse of a great political organization as in this election. There must be a removal of corrupt bosses and a wide change of policy if the Republican party is to escape the fate of the Whigs. Only a return to the example and teachings of Lincoln can ever bring back to the party its departed power.

The stump orator with his stale jokes and false arguments, his partizan rant and vulgar bombast, was useless in the late canpaign. The tax paying voters regarded all that old clap-trap with quiet contempt. This accounts for the total wanc of "enthusiasm" that the "workers" complained so much about. People gave no attention to the efforts made to amuse and delude them but went on working and thinking. We now know the result of that thinking.

Americans of all political parties may well be proud of the Presidents we have had. Never did any nation have so many chief magistrates whose characters were so high. Those who voted against Mr. Harrison are as ready to concede his virtues and clean manly life, and are as proud of those attributes as his warmest supporters. It was not against the man or the magistrate, but against the vicious system that was beyond his control that such a revolution was effected.

Never was the wit of the Greek proverb more clearly shown than in the result of the election. It is true "Whom the gods mean to destroy they first make mad." This result is also another proof of the sagacity and foresight of James G. Blaine. Against his earnest and even indignant protest the stupendous iniquity of the McKinley bill was perpetrated. He saw that the limit of endurance of an outraged people had been reached, and finding that the corrupt men who had got control of the machinery of his party had determined to set justice at defiance, and that he was powerless to prevent the ruin he foresaw, he left them to their fate. Never was the sound judgment of a statesman more fully indicated.

Paying a Debt.

The celebrated French poet, Saint-Foix, who, in spite of his large income, was always in debt, sat one day in a barber's shop waiting to be shaved. He was lathered, when the door opened and a tradesman entered who happened to be one of the poet's largest creditors. No sooner did this man see Saint-Foix than he angrily demanded his money. The poet composedly begged him not to make a scene.

"Won't you wait for the money until I am shaved?"

"Certainly," said the other, pleased at the prospect.

Saint-Foix then made the barber a witness of the agreement and immediately took a towel, wiped the lather from his face and left the shop. He wore a beard to the end of his days.—London Tit-Bits.

Courtship in China.

A curious custom prevails at Huayning-hsien, in Kwangsi. On the fifteenth day of the first month in each year all the young ladies and gentlemen take a walk to the Yen-yen mountain. Each damsel carries a little box, which she deposits at the foot of the hill. Any young gentleman desirous of entering the bonds of matrimony may select one of the boxes and take it away with him, whereupon the fair owner of the box makes herself known and an acquaintanceship is thus formed. Ill assorted matches are not likely to occur, as this custom is observed only among the well to do classes of society.—Schnitzel und Spane.

The Child's Protest.

Joseph Haworth, the actor, tells a story of a little girl who was very curious to know all about thunderstorms, and was told by her mother that they were the voice of God. A few days later the child was caught out in a thunderstorm and called by her mother to come in. Her little legs came toddling up to the piazza as fast as they could, but as she reached the steps there came a terrific clap of thunder, and the little one, looking up, said, with a pained expression on her face: "Oh, Dod, 'oo needn't holler so loud; I'se hurryin dest as fast as I tan."—Buffalo Express.

The Sun Record.

Sunshine is recorded at the meteorological office in England by means of the Stokes-Campbell instrument, the essential feature of which is a spherical lens, which acts as a burning glass. As the sun accomplishes its apparent journey from east to west it burns its autograph into a strip of card placed beneath the lens, but can only do so when it is easy to calculate the amount of actual sunshine with which each day is favored.—Chambers' Journal.

A CLUB FOR WORKERS

A NEW YORK CLUB THAT IS LIKE LONDON'S TOYNBEE HALL.

An Enthusiastic and Willing Lawyer Has Started a Work That Is Already Producing Good Results—Workingmen Have Advantages of Real Club Life.

The nearest approach to a Toynbee Hall in America is the East Side Club. The movement originated in the Church club, an organization consisting of about 400 representative Episcopalians.

Instead of an Oxford tutor, a New York lawyer, Everett P. Wheeler, conceived the idea of a hospitable home, with liberal minded men in residence, where the workingmen of the east side might meet. Mr. Wheeler had just returned from London when he read his paper to the Church club, showing the magnitude and magnificence of the work accomplished in Whitechapel by university extension.

The laymen were so very favorably impressed by the strength of the appeal and the earnestness of their associate that as individuals they agreed to give any project he might formulate their support. That was in March, 1891. In June Mr. Wheeler had rented an old frame dwelling house at the foot of East Seventy-sixth street, once the country residence of a prominent New York physician, to which he gave the name of the East Side club. His family had gone abroad, and when it was learned that Mr. Wheeler had closed his house at the corner of Seventy-first street and Park avenue, and taken up his residence in the club for the summer, his friends in the Lawyers' club, the Church club and society generally were amazed. From chance acquaintances he made friends, and the few who were welcomed to the freedom of the turf and the cool shade about the house welcomed others on their own responsibility. In this simple and cordial way the men were drawn to the East Side club every evening, and on Sundays they brought their children and their lunches and newspapers and picnicked on the grass.

Mr. Wheeler talked to the people. He had every newcomer introduced to him, and he sat on the grass with them; he smoked and read with them, and he not only got their ideas on political, social and industrial questions, but frankly gave his own. Some of these friendly discussions lasted a week, and news of them drew new visitors. When one evening "the club gentleman," as he was called, invited two men to dine with him, his sincerity of purpose was established, and since then the work has prospered.

Associated with Mr. Wheeler were the Rev. Mr. Theodore F. Bacon and Mr. L. D. Hughes, graduate and student of divinity. Notwithstanding the religious tendency of these gentlemen and the support of the Church club, the work was conducted on purely nonsectarian lines. Not a Scripture quotation was seen on the walls, and neither hymnal nor book of common prayer was visible.

The old fashioned dining room was converted into a billiard hall, and here the men smoke and chat, play billiards, chess and checkers whenever they like. At a small expense the conservatory was converted into a gymnasium. On the same floor is the lavatory and bath.

Every day in the week from 9 a. m. until 10 p. m. the clubhouse is open and the attendance in the billiard room and gymnasium is greater Sunday than at any other time. When exception was taken to this unusual plan of operation Mr. Wheeler took the ground that a gentleman might play a game of billiards in his private club Sunday afternoon if the notion pleased him without exciting any comment among the members. Granting this privilege to a merchant, banker or professional man, why should it be denied his truckman and clerks? It also occurred to him that a game of cards in a private club was not only less baneful, but less expensive than in a saloon or beer garden.

Another innovation is a monthly dance to which all the members are invited to bring their wives, sisters and friends. Good music is provided, simply printed dancing cards are distributed and in the middle of the programme hot chocolate and cake or coffee and sandwiches are served. The young clergyman is always present, and no group, however small, is unattended in the club, and in consequence noisy harangues, profanity and discord are unknown.

Now there are five club residents—Mr. W. S. Brush, also a lawyer; Mr. Paul Reynolds, editor of a religious paper; Mr. Willis B. Holcom, Mrs. Virginia Gookin, the kindergartner, and her little son.

The janitor and his wife take care of the house and John Codet, aged sixteen, is custodian of the playgrounds. During the day Mrs. Gookin teaches all the children who come to the kindergarten. Last October an epidemic broke out and the school had to be closed. Several deaths resulted from measles and fever. The work was resumed recently with a membership of fifty. At the start these toddlers had to be washed and scrubbed; now they present themselves clean and tidy.

Any self respecting man may become a member of the club by paying fifty cents a month. This fee entitles the member to all the privileges and advantages of a social and friendly organization. It gives his children the freedom of the playgrounds seven days in the week and provides kindergarten training for them. It welcomes his wife to the mothers' meetings and the general entertainments, and it gives him the use of a gymnasium, library and reading room, and a cozy and beautiful place to spend his holidays. It brings him in contact with at least three sympathetic and influential men on whom he can depend for many courtesies calulated to relieve the monotony and reduce the struggles for existence.—New York World.

Accurate.

In a breach of promise case, the other day, the lady on the stand said that when a friend suggested that she would make him a good wife, he answered: "Hem!" "Did he really say 'Hem?'" inquires the counsel for the defense. "He did," she averred, "or something of that kind." This reminds one of the accurate witness who swore that some one had called over the banisters, "Tom, Tom," or words to that effect.—San Francisco Argonaut.

GOVERNOR SEWARD'S LOST BET.

He Fails to Establish His Identity and Loses Twenty Dollars.

The other afternoon, when the shadows were growing longer in the streets and the day was taking on a somber hue, a little group of politicians sat in the city hall regaling each other with ye stories of ye olden time. Among those reeled off was the following regarding an experience of William H. Seward, who was then governor of the Empire State. It seems that while traveling around through the rural districts and making sure that his political fences had no very bad breaks in them, he came one evening to the humble abode of a farmer.

It was too far from the town where he was stopping to go back that night, and so he asked permission to stop there. This was cheerfully granted, and after partaking of an old fashioned country supper the old farmer invited his unknown guest to take a ride across the country with him, he having an errand to do in a neighboring village. With all the suavity for which Mr. Seward was justly famed, he accepted the invitation, and as they drove along in the gathering twilight he entertained the old farmer with all manner of campaign experiences and stories.

The old farmer's native shrewdness caused him to wonder why the stranger should show him so much attention, and at last he blurted out:

"Say, be you a book agent?"

"Not that I know of," was the governor's smiling rejoinder.

"Perhaps you're a lightning rod man, eh?"

"No, sir; you are wrong again."

"Then you're a sewing machine man."

"No, sir."

"Well, then, by gosh, you must be a politician.'"

Mr. Seward at once acknowledged the soft impeachment, and then informed the inquisitive old fellow that he was the governor of the state of New York. This quieted the old fellow for awhile, but at last he could hold in no longer, and he quietly informed Mr. Seward that he thought he was a liar. Mr. Seward, however, insisted on the truth of his story, and the dispute finally resulted in a wager of twenty dollars. The money was placed in an old lantern that was carried in the wagon to be used in case of emergency, and it was agreed that the first person they met was to decide as to the ownership of the money. Should he fail to recognize Mr. Seward as governor the former was to win, and vice versa.

The test soon came. Driving by the shop of a wayside blacksmith, the proprietor himself stood in the doorway. The farmer stopped his wagon and Mr. Seward said:

"My friend, my veracity has been questioned by the gentleman with me, and I should be pleased to have him convinced as to who I am. Will you be kind enough to tell him?"

The man of brawn and muscle peered at Mr. Seward long and earnestly. Then turning to the farmer he said, in awe-struck tones:

"He's all right, Bill! I know him! He's Thurlow Weed, by gosh!"

The farmer took the twenty dollars and Mr. Seward was poorer by that amount than when he started out.—Chicago Mail.

A Trick of Cross Examination.

In an action for payment of a tailor's bill, a witness swore that a certain dress coat was badly made, one of the sleeves being longer than the other. "You will," said Erskine slowly, having risen to cross examine, "swear—that one of the sleeves was—longer—than the other?"

Witness—I do swear it.

Erskine (quickly, and with a flash of indignation)—Then, sir, I am to understand that you positively deny that one of the sleeves was shorter than the other?

Startled into a self contradiction by the suddenness and impetuosity of this thrust, the witness said, "I do deny it."

Erskine (raising his voice as the tumultuous laughter died away)—Thank you, sir; I don't want to trouble you with another question.—San Francisco Argonaut.

Soldiers Prefer Grain Food.

Cornmeal was the grand necessary of life to those legionaries who, led by Cæsar, subdued the world, and who counted themselves starved and were apt to mutiny if reduced to the "famine fare" of animal food. Even British troops have been known to suffer from an exclusive meat diet, as indeed we found to our cost in the Zulu campaign of 1878, while the preference of the Roman soldiery for the vegetable food has its justification in the experience of the Russian army, and still more of the German one in 1870, which carried that memorable campaign to its triumphant close on the Erbswurst (pea sausage favored for a little bacon).—London Lancet.

Large Family.

Patsy Dooley was a very poor arithmetician, and was puzzled by a great many questions of numbers which did not enter other people's heads.

One day a new acquaintance remarked in his presence:

"I have eight brothers."

"Ye have eight brothers?" said Patsy. "Then I suppose ivery wan o' thim has eight brothers too?"

"Certainly."

"Arrah, thin," said Patsy, "how many mothers had the sixty-foor o' ye?"—Youth's Companion.

Paper Fire Engines.

A novel fire engine is being tried by the Berlin fire department. The carriage is constructed entirely of papier mache, all the different parts—body, poles, etc.—being fashioned in the best possible way. The weight is much less than the ordinary carriage, while the durability is equally great.—New York Journal.

The Common Snake.

The common snake is found throughout Europe (save in Ireland, the Orkneys, Hebrides, Shetland islands and Iceland), extending northward in Scandinavia to 65 degs. It abounds in Sicily, Sardinia and Corsica, and occurs, though rarely, in Algiers, but not thence eastward in Africa. It is found in Persia and western Siberia, and Asia as far Lake Baikal, and in the Alps at an altitude of 6,000 feet.—Quarterly Review.

An Animated Storage Reservoir.

The Australian lamprey has its principal habitat in the Murray river, and consequently in the dry seasons it is apt to be imbedded beneath the hardened clay, where no water is. As the stream recedes, the animal fills its pouch and disappears into the soft mud below, there to remain until the drought has passed away, subsisting on the moisture which it has learned to store in a specialized receptacle at the side of the head. As a matter of fact, the fish has mastered the difficult question of water storage on its own account before the race of homo sapiens has been able to solve the same problem in the island continent.

It is an interesting question whether this Australian lamprey is not a lingering example of the fish of Miocene ages, and as such may be considered as an ancestral type of European lampreys. A sea lamprey that I examined alive, caught in the salmon nets of the tidal estuary, had a distinct tendency to swell at either side of the head, as if the pouch might be forthcoming in time of actual necessity. If the Australian type is not the absolute ancestor of the British genera, it is at least reasonable to suppose that it is an older form, and that the divergent genera and species have descended along different lines in the great life struggle. That the pouch of the antipodean lamprey is intended for the storage of water is a fact that can hardly be doubted by any one who has seen the species amid its peculiar surroundings.—Cornhill Magazine.

Stage Struck.

Two men met on a train going west. They had known each other in the sixties and resumed acquaintance with a vim.

"An how's that bright boy of yours?" asked the city man of his old time friend.

"Peart, peart as ever, pard. I were goin to make a minister of him, but he got stage struck and took to that line as nat'ral as a duck does to water, an I had to gin in. And he's the best shot in Montany."

"Took to the stage, eh? And has he been successful?"

"Successful? Well, I reckon he hez. Why, their ain't a man can be named in the same day with Bill. He kin drop a grizzly in his tracks without ever comin down from his perch."

"What is his role?"

"Roll? I don't savey, pard."

"I mean what line is he in?"

"Oh, the Mounting an Valley line that runs to Goochville through Catamount Grove and Grizzly Hollow. Taint fun all the time either, pard, when bandits is layin low for yer money or yer life."

"Ah, he does the sensational on the boards. I see. A low comedian."

"Nothin low about Bill, ole friend. He just sits up on the top of the Montany stage an drives his four-in-hand as easy as rollin off a log. Ez I said, the stage wuz right in his line, an he's a thunderin good driver."—Detroit Free Press.

The Baby and the Savage.

In the bone caves of the south of France have been found figures of reindeer, mammoths and men cut on horn or ivory, and evidently executed by artists contemporary with the Elephas primigenius. The men are represented with short, bent legs, and seem to stand or walk in a stooping manner, with the body bowed slightly forward from the hips.

Now pass your hand down the back of any infant under ten months old and feel the spine at the loin or lumbar region, where in the adult modern man the back is hollow or concave. You will observe that in the babe it is convex like that of a quadruped (a ten-month-old baby is practically a quadruped); and though the child can, perhaps, get on its legs with the support of a chair, it does not straighten its thighs and stand upright, but is bent forward in the same posture of the cave dweller, whose portrait has come down to us from the age just succeeding the last glacial epoch. If the support is removed the child falls forward and again becomes a pseudo quadruped.—Blackwood's Magazine.

Not So Green as He Looked.

A man entered a busy city office a few weeks ago and asked permission to use the telephone. He walked to the corner pointed out by one of the clerks, looked curiously at the instrument and after a furtive glance toward the other occupants of the room took down the receiver and gently whispered into it, "Hullo."

A broad smile passed around the room, and one of the younger clerks called out in patronizing tones, "Oh, no, uncle; hang up the tube, ring the bell on the right, then put the tube to your ear and talk to that little hole before you."

The man obediently hung up the receiver and turned toward the speaker. "Thank you!" he said dryly, "I am the general inspector of this telephone line."—Youth's Companion.

A New Profession.

Mr. Charles Richon, of Paris, has adopted quite a novel method of earning a living. His cards are worded: "Charles Richon, Imitator of Nightingales for Gardens and Restaurants." Our professional appears to be fully occupied during the summer season. Every time a wealthy bourgeois, owning a plot of land twelve meters in extent, invites his friends to a garden party, Charles Richon conceals himself behind the flower pots and oleander tubs and charms the company by imitating the glorious trills of the most melodious of our feathered songsters.—Temps.

Gold Fillings for False Teeth.

"Funny business, this," remarked a dentist, turning from his workbench and addressing the reporter. "What?" "Filling false teeth. Every now and then, when we make a set of false teeth, we are asked to fill two or three of the front ones, so that the gold when the wearer smiles will shine like a darkey's heel. This takes away the counterfeit appearance of the teeth to some extent. It's a counterfeit upon a counterfeit.

"Persons who have this kind of work done are willing to pay for it, and as they always want a good showing of gold, and are very particular as to the appearance of the work, we have to charge well for it. Somehow I don't like to do it. When we have made the counterfeit teeth it always seems to me that the deception has gone far enough."—Indianapolis Journal.

Melbourne is just emerging from the overwhelming effects of a land boom. All trades are stagnant and the unemployed are clamoring for work.

Danger in Crowding the Toes.

It is well known that the connection between the nerves in the feet, and especially those in the great toe, and the brain and general nervous organization is strong. Dr. Brown-Sequard mentions a patient who, whenever he bore the weight of his body on the toes of his right foot, became violently insane. He also speaks of another case where pressure on the toe caused severe nervous paroxysms.

These cases simply show the importance of a proper care of the feet, a portion of the body that many people neglect. They think that they can crowd their feet into tight shoes and abuse them without serious results. They can't do it, however. This crowding of five toes into a space not large enough for three, results in pressing the joints out of shape and sometimes making them inactive and powerless. No man with his toes half paralyzed can walk properly. The control of the toes is necessary for a springy step. Broad soles and low heels give room for all the toes and allow perfect freedom of action to every muscle. People who have false standards of beauty for the feet, however, insist on wearing a shoe that is not natural in shape, and the result is great discomfort, and in some cases death.

As a consequence of these abuses we are forgetting how to walk properly. Perhaps you don't believe it, but just watch the parade on Broadway some fine afternoon and see how few men and women walk on the street as if they were not conscious of tight shoes and deformed feet.—Interview in New York Sun.

The Age of Coal Burning.

I have heard that when King Hudson, in the zenith of his fame, was asked as to what his railways were to do when all the coal was burned out, he replied, that by that time we should have learned how to burn water. Those who are asked the same question now will often reply that they will use electricity, and doubtless think that they have thus disposed of the question. The fallacy of such answers is obvious.

A so called "water gas" may no doubt be used for developing heat, but it is not the water which supplies the energy. Trains may be run by electricity, but all that the electricity does is to convey the energy from the point where it is generated to the train which is in motion. Electricity is itself no more a source of power than is the rope with which a horse drags a boat along the canal.

The fact is that a very large part of the boasted advance of civilization is merely the acquisition of an increased capability of squandering. For what are we doing every day but devising fresh appliances to exhaust with ever greater rapidity the hoard of coal.—Robert Ball in Fortnightly Review.

When Finished.

Busy persons, forced to defend themselves from interminable talkers, who have little to say, can appreciate a hint to which Henry IV of France once resorted. A parliamentary deputy called upon him and made a long speech.

The king listened patiently for a time, then he decided that his visitor would do well to condense his remarks. He took him by the hand and led him to where they could see the gallery of the Louvre.

"What do you think of that building? When it is finished it will be a good thing, will it not?"

"Yes," replied the man of many words, not guessing what was coming next.

"Well, monsieur, that is just the way with your discourse," was the king's mild observation.—Youth's Companion.

COURT NOTES.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

SATURDAY, Nov. 5, 1892.

Estate and guardianship of Hattie, Lena and Jacob Vagt—Filed inventory and appraisement.

Filed petition for correcting ballots. Filed order for correcting ballots.

It's a Bird!

Emmons Spencer Esq. of Big Pine is in town.

J. J. Morton came up from Keeler yesterday, returning to-day.

The Democrats have a majority on the Board of Supervisors.

Mrs. Fannie Baker of Big Pine is visiting friends at Independence.

John Morton, long a resident of Keeler, died at San Francisco last Saturday.

Mr. I. W. McLoughlin is in town. He has been mining at Keynot all summer.

Mrs. McKillips of Cheysopolis and her family are on their way to San Bernardino to pass the winter.

The toilers have now had their say and the system that robbed them to make a few men enormously wealthy is repudiated.

J. W. P. Laird Esq. is expected here from Bakersfield in a few days. He comes to attend to cases in the Superior Court.

Mr. C. Stewart, a carpenter and builder from Hawthorne, Nevada, is at Independence. He has a contract to build the school house at Lone Pine and intends to begin work next week.

On the evenings of next Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday Mr. S. P. Putnam will give a series of free lectures at the Court House. The subject of the lectures will be "Free Thought."

George Sontag has been sentenced to State prison for life. He tried to prove that he was elsewhere when his brother John and Chris Evans robbed the train in Fresno county, but the jury believed his story was false and convicted him.

Hon. A. R. Conklin has been elected Superior Judge of Kern county. He was appointed to the same position by Governor Watterman and his election now after nearly two years service is evidence that in the conduct of his office he has given satisfaction to the people.

The following Associated Press dispatch was received yesterday afternoon: "The following additional states go Democratic: Indiana, Ohio, Wisconsin, Wyoming, Connecticut and Illinois. California claimed by Democrats, but Republicans still have hopes. It is conceded Democrats will have both houses Congress."

The new ballots are very satisfactory to voters and the election officers say they are easy to count. Some mistakes were made that would not occur again; in a very few cases, one at least at Independence, one voter placed the X opposite every name upon the ticket that he intended to vote against, thus defeating his own will. At Georges Creek two ballots were not counted because pencil marks had been used instead of the rubber stamp required by law.

Horrible Death.

Last Tuesday morning about half-past one o'clock a house at Lone Pine was destroyed by fire. The building was occupied by Lionicio Lopez, who followed the business of making and selling tomales. Lopez must have been asleep when the fire occurred. As soon as the alarm was given neighbors rushed to the place but the building was then all in flames. It was a small structure and was reduced to ashes in a very short time. Lopez must have been suffocated by heat and smoke soon after the fire began; he was seen no more alive. Coroner Matlack held an inquest and a verdict of accidental death was given. Deceased was 35 years old.

THE RESULT

Cleveland elected by an overwhelming majority.

Caminetti elected to Congress by large majority.

Mack elected Assemblyman by large majority.

Gorman elected Sheriff.

The Clerkship in doubt. Hessian is four votes ahead with Panamint to hear from.

Bunney elected Treasurer.

Forbes elected District Attorney.

Woodin elected Coroner.

Joseph Seely elected Surveyor.

Freeman, Uhlmeyer, Wilson and Fitz- elected Supervisors.

How to Come to a Stop.

SAINT JACOBS OIL TRY IT

When we least expect them, accidents will befall us, a verification of the old adage that the unexpected always happens. The following recites how an active business man was suddenly brought down.

THE TRAIN STOPS.

CINCIN., O.—" Recently while in the act of alighting from my car, I stepped upon a stone, which, turning suddenly under my foot, threw me to the ground, with a severely sprained ankle.

THE MANAGER STOPS.

Suffering exceedingly, I was helped into my car, and my man rubbed me most generously with arnica and kindred remedies, but to no avail.

A POINT TO STOP AT.

Reaching a station where St. Jacobs Oil could be procured, two bottles of it were bought, and the application of it resulted at once in a relief from pain, which had well nigh become unbearable. I was out and about my work in three days."

Saved His Client.

Fifteen years ago Judge McSweeney was a famous criminal lawyer of southern Michigan. He was called upon to defend a young woman from the charge of having poisoned her old husband. It was a question of whether or not she had placed poison in a cake of which the old man had eaten. A portion of the cake had been analyzed by a chemist and found to contain a great deal of deadly poison. The chemist testified to this in court. Other witnesses succeeded in making a chain of damning evidence against the pretty young widow. The time came for the summing up speeches of the attorneys. The prosecution began and finished, and all looked hopeless for the prisoner at the bar. Judge McSweeney, the only speaker for the defense, arose amid breathless silence. The room was crowded and all were listening. One could almost hear the quiet, it was so intense. He began in a low tone to sum up the evidence in defense of the prisoner. He had been allowed an hour in which to plead his side of the case.

He dealt with everything but the cake. It rested upon the table just at his right hand, where it had stood during all the weary trial. Thirty minutes passed and the people were still motionless, charmed by the sweet eloquence of the gruff old lawyer. Three-quarters of an hour passed by, then another ten minutes. When the clock over the big desk told him there were but five minutes left, he reached his hand out to the cake, half of which stood upon the table, and broke off a ragged chunk. He held this in his hand and between sentences took great mouthfuls of it. During those five minutes he calmly argued the case and ate cake. He demolished more than half of it. The chemist had declared that there was enough poison in it to kill fifty men. The good people looked at him in amazement and the jurors turned to each other and whispered. McSweeney wound up his speech, took another chunk of cake and walked quietly from the courtroom eating it.

He closed the door behind him, ran into a small room close by and locked the door. Two physicians stood ready with a stomach pump, and in ten minutes the cake was all in the slop jar. The jury returned a verdict of "not guilty" without leaving the courtroom.—Kansas City Times.

Colorado's Big Trout.

In the Rocky mountains one day a friend and myself came upon a little summer hotel near a crystal stream. There was an old man smoking a pipe on a bench at the front door. As we approached my friend said: "Now, there is one Colorado fisherman who will believe any fish story you're a mind to tell him. Just try it." I walked up to the old man and said:

"Splendid fishing over in that stream, eh, stranger?"

"Yes, sir; splendid fishing."

"I know it. I was up here last summer, and I got a whopping trout on my line—he broke it snap in two."

"Yes, the trout do that up here," the man answered, with a peculiar drawl.

"Then I got a rope and fished with that, but the trout broke that too."

"Yes, the trouts often break ropes up here."

"Well, then," I went on, "I was decided to land him, and I got him on a log chain and pulled him out."

"Yes; log chains is the only thing what will pull the trouts out up here."

"Well, you see, after I got this big trout out we couldn't get him up to the house."

"Yes, it's powerful hard to pull our trouts up here."

"So I got a yoke of oxen, put the trout on the sledge, and after a hard pull succeeded in getting him up to the house."

"Yes," said the old man without a smile; "a yoke of oxen with a sledge is the only thing what can carry our trouts up here."

I was getting desperate. The old codger shouldn't agree with me longer if I could prevent him.

"Well, sir," I continued, "we took that trout and turned him out to pasture with the cattle."

"Yes," said the old rascal, "that's what we allus do with our trout up here."

"Yes, sir," I urged, "and after he had been there among the cattle for about three months he grew horns."

"What!" and the old man straightened up; "a fish grow horns?"

"Yes, sir," I continued.

"Stranger," he said, rising to his feet and advancing toward me, "that's a darned lie."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

One of Labouchere's Stories.

One of Labouchere's stories about the admiralty and the way "My Lords" conduct their labors at Whitehall is as follows:

A few years ago a gun was lost by bursting in the Sea of Marmora, and upon reading the report of the admiral in command of the fleet "My Lords" were moved to telegraph to ask whether there was any chance of the muzzle of the gun being recovered. The answer was that in view of the fact that the gun had been lost in eighty fathoms of water, nearly out of sight of land, where no cross bearings could have been taken, the likelihood of its recovery was very remote. Thereupon "My Lords" wanted to know why no engineer's accounts had been sent in from the vessel in question, but they ceased telegraphing when the admiral replied that the ship had been for ten years a sailing ship!

AUBREY'S FAMOUS RIDE.

A Feat That Has Few Parallels in Physical Endurance and Bravery.

"The greatest physical achievement ever accomplished in this country," said John F. Graham, "was the ride of F. X. Aubrey from the plaza of Santa Fe, N. M., to the public square at Independence, Mo., a distance of nearly eight hundred miles, through a country inhabited by warlike Indians, a large part of which was then a sandy desert."

Being urged to give an account of the great ride Graham proceeded:

"It was about the year 1851 that Aubrey gave his wonderful test of human endurance, before which all other attempts of the kind pale into insignificance. He was a short, heavy set man 33 years of age, in the prime of manhood and strength. His business for ten years as a Santa Fe trader had made him perfectly familiar with the trail and all the stopping places. He was a perfect horseman, and although there were great riders in those days, none of them cared to dispute the palm with Aubrey. On a wager of $1,000 he undertook to ride alone from Santa Fe to Independence inside of six days. It was thirty-nine years ago that he undertook the terrible feat. It was to be the supreme effort of his life, and he sent a half dozen of the swiftest horses ahead to be stationed at different points for use in the ride.

"He left Santa Fe in a sweeping gallop and that was the pace he kept up during nearly every hour of the time until he fell fainting from his foam covered horse in the square at Independence. No man could keep with the rider and he would have killed every horse in the west rather than to have failed in the undertaking. It took him just five days and nineteen hours to perform the feat and it cost the lives of several of his best horses. After being carried into a room at the old hotel at Independence Aubrey lay for forty-eight hours in a dead stupor before he came to his senses. He would never have recovered from the shock had it not been for his wonderful constitution. The feat was unanimously regarded by western men as the greatest exhibition of strength and endurance ever known on the plains."

"What became of Aubrey afterward?" was asked.

"After his ride he became the lion of the west and was dined and feted at St. Louis as though he had been a conquering hero. He finally met his death at the hand of a friend. One day in 1854, in an altercation with Maj. Richard H. Weightman, the great rider was stabbed to the heart and dropped dead in Santa Fe. He was buried in an unknown grave and all that is remembered of Aubrey is his remarkable ride. Weightman was tried upon the charge of murder, but was acquitted, and joining the Confederate army was shot at Wilson's Creek while leading his brigade into battle."—Denver News.

Jokes of Business Men.

A well known lawyer and his broker friend dropped their tickets into the glass aquarium on the city hall elevated station, and as the lawyer stopped to buy the evening papers he jerked down and pinned to his friend's back the large yellow placard placed under the latest editions and reading, "Out Today."

"Hello, here, how long have you been out of Sing Sing?" said a friend, slapping the broker familiarly on the back.

The broker laughed when shown the card, but insisted on keeping it. The incident had been forgotten when one day the broker stuck his head into his friend's office and said: "Better come down the Sound fishing today."

"Can't possibly do it," answered the lawyer. "Have made an engagement to meet some clients here on important business." "All right," said his friend. The lawyer waited in vain for his clients. He heard several people approach the office, but no one entered, and when he left the office he saw a huge yellow placard on his door reading "Out Today." The smile he tried to give was a failure. —New York Times.

The Bob Cook Stroke.

"Bob Cook's stroke is the result of Bob Cook's exhaustive study of a man from his heels to the crown of his head," said a member of the Yale nine. "I have watched his work with our crew very carefully. Everybody is familiar with the success he has achieved, but it is not generally realized that what is known as the Bob Cook stroke is not an accidental discovery by this prince of athletes, but is the result of years of painstaking and exhaustive study on the general subject of the physical possibilities of the human frame in athletics. The stroke today is a masterpiece of genius which has solved the problem of imparting the greatest amount of force to the end of a long oar by the least possible expenditure of strength. That is rather a sophomoric statement, but it covers the grounds of Bob Cook's life work."—New York World.

How to Keep Oysters.

There is an ingenious device for keeping oysters good in the shell for several weeks after they have been taken from the water. Hitherto this has been done unsatisfactorily by boring holes through the edges of the shells and locking in the oysters with bits of twisted wire. By the new scheme the edges of the shells are dipped into plaster of paris mixed with certain chemicals that make it harden quickly. In a few minutes the oyster is hermetically sealed, and so strong is the cement that not even the most muscular mollusk can manage to get a breath of fresh air after having been subjected to this process.—Exchange.

Two years ago George Croft, of Oshkosh, Wis., loaned a friend $10, to be returned by mail. Soon after he got a letter asking if he had received the money. Croft replied no. A short time after he received a letter with the $10 in it, and the friend declared he had once before sent the money. Not long since Croft received the first letter containing $10, which was sent Aug. 17, 1888, to Ashland, and had lain there two years.

Diamond Back Terrapin Come High.

A householder from Murray Hill made a journey to Fulton market one day last week in search of diamond back terrapin. He learned there was none to be had.

"Then send me up a half dozen of the first that are brought in," said the Murray Hill resident. "By the way, what are they selling for now?"

"Sixty dollars a dozen," replied the marketman.

"Well, they are worth it," remarked the epicure from uptown. "Diamond backs come high, but we must have them," and he walked away.

"If it was $100 a dozen," said the marketman to a Tribune reporter who was standing near, "people in this city would pay that sum for diamond backs and never grumble."

"How is it that the supply ever runs out when the price is so high?" asked the reporter.

"Terrapin with the genuine diamond shaped scales are not to be picked up like clams at low tide," said the dealer. "Sometimes they are not to be had at all. We depend principally for our diamond backs on the supply caught by fishermen in their nets during the summer and kept over till the winter market makes them valuable. The fishermen build pens along the shore, partly in the water and partly on the land, into which they put the diamond backs they haul up during the summer. These they sell in the winter at a handsome figure. Then the old fishermen who are too stiff and rheumatic to follow their trade at sea spend the fall and winter days puttering along the shore, poking sticks down in the sand to find the terrapin that crawl up out of the sea at the approach of winter, burrow in the sand and hibernate till spring. These old fellows know by signs just where to poke down in the sand for a diamond back. If they can find half a dozen a week they have made good wages." —New York Tribune.

Bethlehem.

An air of cheerfulness and brightness is about the place. The gay and brilliant young Eothen of half a century ago gives a playful description of his own delight in finding smiling faces and the laughter of girls upon his path in the little hill city of the nativity; and one cannot but remember his words when the women flock out to their doors—in greater numbers, surely, than in other places—as the carriage dashes up a narrow street where the panels almost graze the walls, and the pavement seems composed of bowlders like the bed of a mountain stream. This is a trifle in the east, where in towns much more important than this, which is little among the cities of Judah—thriving cities like Smyrna and Beyrout—you drive over thoroughfares like water courses at the peril of your life.

The inhabitants of Bethlehem are all Christians, which is cheering to begin with, and the feminine part of them are unusually distinguished by good looks, and wear a beautiful costume—embroidered jacket with long hanging sleeves, and skirts in various colors—exceedingly picturesque and striking. Their heads are adorned with silver chains and coins encircling the forehead and falling on each side of the face, over which the women who are married wear some sort of a stiff round cap, over which is arranged a long veil of the fine unbleached linen which is peculiar to the east, embroidered with a heavy border in rich colors of silk—red and purple and blue. This headdress gives a kind of mild majesty to their clear tints and well cut features, and they sell their vegetables like princesses—not in disguise, but gracefully condescending to supply their fellow creatures with the necessities of life.—Blackwood's Magazine.

The Autograph Hunter Foiled.

There is a certain young professional man who has a mania for securing autographs and letters, if possible, of noted persons. He had been informed that a certain poet of world wide reputation, an American, never gave his autograph. But he made up his mind he was going to have it without asking for it. He wrote a business like letter to the exclusive poet stating that he desired a sketch of his life for a work of a literary nature he was preparing, and asked the poet if he could inform the writer where a reliable sketch could be found. This, he thought, would be sure to bring at least a line or two from the famous writer. Imagine his chagrin, a day or two later, at receiving in a sealed envelope a printed biography, unaccompanied by even the scratch of a pen. To cap the climax, even the envelope was addressed by a typewriter.—Albany Argus.

Have You Ever Thought of This?

When a wheel is in motion does the top move faster than the bottom? Nine people out of ten would cry nonsense at the mere question. Both the top and bottom of the wheel must, of necessity, it would seem, be moving forward at one and the same rate—i. e., the speed at which the carriage is traveling. Not so, however, as a little reflection would convince you. The top is moving in the direction of the wheel's motion of translation, while the bottom is moving in opposition to this motion. In other words, the top is moving forward in the same direction in which the carriage is progressing, while the bottom is moving backward, or in an opposite direction. That is why an instantaneous photograph of a carriage in motion shows the upper part of the wheel in a confused blur, while the spokes in the lower part are distinctly visible.—Illustrated American.

Boston's High Priced Lots.

According to the assessor's valuation, the most valuable piece of real estate in the city of Boston is the property at the corner of Washington and State streets, now occupied by the Boston and Maine Railroad company as a ticket office. The lot contains 532 square feet and is appraised at $119 per foot. The property at the corner of Washington and Winter streets stands second in the list of valuable estates in Boston. This contains 1,955 square feet of land, which is appraised at $118 per foot. The third estate in value is the one at the corner of Washington and State streets, now occupied by bankers for office purposes. This contains 860 square feet and is appraised at $100 per foot.—Boston Traveler.

The Waiter's Mistake.

Like the farmer's daughter who counted the chickens before they were hatched, the thoughts of waiter maidens do not always rest upon the viands which they serve. At a restaurant much frequented by the German element one of the absent minded fair sex approached a handsome youth who had seated himself at the table, and, balancing a tray full of dishes, inquired, "Are you married?" instead of the usual query, "Have you ordered?" "Nein," replied the young man with a roar of laughter. The reminder so startled the girl that she dropped the china, shivering it into fragments, and retired with a face in color resembling a boiled lobster.—Philadelphia Enquirer.

TEETH EXTRACTED PAINLESSLY.

Dr. G. W. Leek's Letter.—How it is Done To-day, and How it Used to be Done.

Since Dr. G. W. Leek of 6 O'Farrell St., S. F., first discovered how to extract teeth, and fill them painlessly, which has been only five years since, without the use of any dangerous dental gas, ether, or chloroform his office has been beseiged by patients from all parts of the world, who had heard of his wonderful discovery. Among the nobility of Europe, Dr. Leek's name is a household word, and many a person has crossed the waters for no other purpose than to visit Dr. Leek, the most expert dentist in America, (we can safely say the world because America leads the world in dentistry). Dr. Leek has not only revolutionized dentistry in the extracting of teeth, but by a new method he can fill up a mouth that has a few stumps left in it, with teeth without any plate whatever to hold them in the mouth; they do not loosen or fall while chewing or speaking. To get this method of dental work the King Mambora of the Gilbert Islands visited San Francisco, and spent a week with Dr. Leek, as his patient and guest, and several of his head generals accompanied him as his body guard and to get Dr. Leek to fill, treat and replace their partially and fully destroyed teeth. In the olden times, and even to-day outside of Dr. Leek's dental office, one has to inhale ether, chloroform, or gas for painless tooth extraction. Any of these anesthetics is liable to produce death or paralysis of the mind or body. Many people have lost their memory from one dose of dental gas, nitrous oxide or laughing gas, and can not account for the cause. We think no person ought to take chances with his life or health, when any railroad can transport them to a person who can relieve them without any danger of death or sickness. To accommodate the immense throng of people who wish Dr. Leek to operate for them or to get his style of work, Dr. Leek has found it necessary to segregate his quality of work and only do at his main office, 6 O'Farrell Street, work that demands his personal supervision. All cheaper work he recommends to his dental college, on the corner of Fifth and Market Streets, where only a little more than the cost of the material used is charged for the work. Extracting at that place is 25 cts.; filling from 25 cts. to $1.00; gold filling about $1.00, owing to the size of the cavity; plates about $4.00. So from the above figures it appears that no person is too poor to get Dr. Leek to fix their teeth up by some of the cheaper methods, if not by his later improved methods. He has now four patents, and applications for two more, which he claims will be equally as valuable as any one of his past inventions. At his college, No. 1 Fifth Street, only graduates are allowed to take a course, or to operate, so all the work done at the college is good work. In other dental offices all teeth lost can only be replaced by the aid of artificial plates, which are generally troublesome to wear. We are informed by several people who have shown us work done at Dr. Leek's College, that has gone from this vicinity to San Francisco, that the work is very fine, most of the work being done by the professors which assures it being good.

Dr. Leek is surely a wonderful man and dentist, worthy of the confidence and patronage of all who go to San Francisco to have any difficult or complicated dental work done.

A Drowning Man's Experience.

To prevent any person from interfering with my design I jumped into the river late in the afternoon Friday. No one appeared to be about at the time. When I struck the water I immediately sank, going down and down, and yet being carried forward until I thought I would never again arise. A sound roared through my head; it seemed to me it would burst. I opened my mouth and attempted to breathe, being unable to endure the pressure longer, but the water rushed in and I closed my mouth. I was again compelled to open it. More water entered. The feeling was horrible.

Just when I thought all was over I reached the surface of the water about fifty feet from the shore and 100 feet from where I had jumped in. Near by was a steamboat on which stood a man with a long pole with an iron hook on the end. It took only a second to see those things, and in fact I had just time to get one breath when I again sank with my mouth open. My past life flashed before me, and I was again a child. The picture of my father and mother stood out in bold relief. I reached out my hand to them. The roaring of the water sounded like the sweetest of music. Suddenly I saw light and thought I was in paradise. A large green field covered with roses and other flowers, whose fragrance I could smell, came in view. I felt as if I was being borne up by some winged messenger whom I could not see, but whose presence I could feel.

I remembered nothing more until I felt a rough jerk. My rescuer had succeeded in fastening the boathook in my clothing. As my body was being pulled from out of the water the picture changed; instead of paradise, the place in which the devil dwells, with all its fires and swarming with hideous, red dressed creatures and other things, presented themselves in my mind, only to again quickly disappear and leave me in darkness. When I came to I was surprised to learn I had been unconscious. Every muscle in my body pained me, but my brain was perfectly clear. Drowning, after the first stages are past, is pleasant.—St. Louis Republic.

Messrs. Palmer & Rey, 405–407 Sansom street, San Francisco, Cal.

DEAR SIRS:—I wish also to state that my afternoon's run of your engine turned out very satisfactory. I sawed from about 2 to 5:30 P. M., between six and seven cords of dry black oak wood twice in two, and it gave me no bother whatever. If it only keeps up that record, and I don't see why it should not, I consider it a great success. I consider, under favorable circumstances, it will saw two cords per hour easy. I will, from time to time, advise you how the engine is doing.

THAT DEAR OLD WORD, GOOD-BY,

Is a mighty sad one when it is the parting salutation between friends whom thousands of miles of salt water are about to separate. Mariners, buyers in foreign lands for heavy houses, commercial travelers who have made many trips across the stormy Atlantic, think little of an ocean voyage, but to the first voyager the initial trip is a momentous affair. Sea sickness is to be expected as a matter of course. How to prevent it? The finest remedy and preventive of the nausea provoked by the tossing of a vessel, the jarring motion of the screw of a steamship, or of a locomotive train, is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, pronounced by sea captains, ship doctors, tourists, travelers and emigrants the finest stomachic and best defense against ailments of the bowels, digestive organs and liver in existence. Malaria, rheumatism, kidney trouble and debility are remedied by it.

Happiness is a good deal like money; a great many persons who have it coming to them are cheated out of it.

DEAFNESS CAN'T BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

I have been afflicted with catarrh for 20 years. It became chronic and extended to my throat, causing hoarseness and great difficulty in speaking, indeed for years I was not able to speak more than thirty minutes, and often this with great difficulty. I also, to a great extent, lost the sense of hearing. By the use of Ely's Cream Balm all dropping of mucous has ceased and my voice and hearing has greatly improved.—Jas. W. BUYING A RANCH.

Three months ago Hon. Horace Greenfield came to America to seek his fortune. He has just returned to England—without the fortune. Being the younger son of a peer of limited means, Hon. Horace had been brought up with a view to the family living, but when just as his university career was drawing to a close, his aunt died and left him a couple of thousand pounds, he relinquished the idea of taking orders, and determined to go out to the far west in search of adventures and wealth, and he persuaded two of his father's servants—a groom and a gardener—to accompany him. With nearly $10,000 in his pocket, an outfit that would last a lifetime—most of it could never be utilized where he was going—two servants and three dogs, he embarked for the United States. After a quick passage he arrived in New York, and here he met his first disappointment. The very next morning, a few minutes before starting on the journey westward, his groom notified him that their relations of master and servant had ceased.

"How is that?" asked Horace.

"Well, you see, sir," said the servant, who was an Irishman, "I have an uncle in this city who is a great politician. I went to see him last night, and he says if I'll stay here he'll make me a p'liceman in ten days. He says as a berth on the p'lice force is worth a salary of $100 a month and a lot of outside money to a smart chap as ain't too partickler."

So Hon. Horace was compelled to go on his way without the groom, although it had cost about $150 to fit him out and pay his passage. He had already been in negotiation for a small ranch near Helena, Tex., and it was thither that he was going. On arriving at Austin he found that there was no train for twenty-four hours, and accordingly he put up at the Shooter's Hotel. Here came in contact for the first time with a "genuine Texan," who greeted him according to the modest stereotyped formula: "Morning, stranger! Hain't seen you hereabout afore. Glad to get 'quainted wi' you. Come to settle? What's your biz? Come and take something."

Young Greenfield met a number of these gentry during the day, and being a frank, unsuspecting young fellow, he readily opened his heart to them and told them of his prospects, his hopes and his intentions. They treated him kindly, always inviting him to drink, but generally leaving him to settle the bill.

In the morning his remaining servant came and begged to be released from his service, stating that a nursery garden in the town had been offered to him, and that, as he had saved sufficient money to enable him to invest in it, he thought that his chances would be better in an independent vocation than in service.

"Are you prepared to reimburse me for my expenses in bringing you here?" asked Horace.

"I can't afford that, sir," was the reply.

"Very well," said Greenfield; "I can't prevent you going. The only creatures that are faithful to me are my dogs. It cost me about $300 to equip and bring you two men out, and you desert me at the first opportunity. You can go."

Attended by his three dogs the young man continued on his journey to Helena, and the next day went to view the ranch which he contemplated purchasing. Things there were not exactly as he had been led to expect, but they were not so bad as to cause him to change his mind. The handsome two story dwelling, a photograph of which had been shown to him in London, turned out to be a combination of stable and cattle shed, with a loft, which had been used by the last owner as his habitation.

The soil was fairly fertile and the pasture good, but the broad deep river which he expected to find flowing in front of the building was in reality only a gully a few feet wide, down which water did slowly trickle in the winter, but which was perfectly dry during the summer months. However, he was not discouraged, and having obtained a concession in the price, he paid the first installment of the purchase money. Then he brought out his three dogs and all his portmanteaus, and took possession of the loft over the stable. Two days later he became the possessor of a horse and a mule, paying a price for them that made his neighbors smile when they heard of it. Every man in the locality now called and offered to sell to him "cheap" many implements and animals which they did not need, but without which, they said, he could not possibly get along.

One individual, whom he had previously met in Austin, came from a distant ranch, and begged him to go and see some cattle he had to sell. Now cattle were what Horace wanted, and believing himself to be a fair judge of them, he mounted his horse and rode away with his new acquaintance. After a ride of about twenty miles they reached an inclosed tract of land, upon which over a hundred head of stock were grazing, unattended by cowboys.

"I tell you, stranger," said the Texan, reining in his horse and looking over the fence, "thar be the finest beasts in this state, and they're to be sold as cheap as dirt—thirty dollars per head all round."

Horace could see at a glance that there was no deception here; they were really fine animals, and in fairly good condition.

"How many are there?" he asked.

"One hundred and fifty," replied the ranchman. "In six months from now, with the pasture you've got, they'll have put on three hundred pounds of flesh apiece, and you know what money that means."

The two men tied their horses to the fence, climbed over it and walked among the animals. It was much the best herd that Horace had seen in Texas, and as it appeared to him that in a few months he could make a handsome profit out of the transaction he announced his intention of buying the lot.

"Done with you, stranger!" cried the Texan, shaking hands energetically with young Greenfield; "and now we'll jist trot into Austin and drink to your success. I do the treating."

They rode into Austin, and going to the hotel at which Horace had stopped a few days before drank to the young Englishman's success in two quarts of champagne, for which the generous Texan paid $10 a bottle. When the wine was consumed the ranchman said:

"The sun'll be getting low, young man, before you git them cattle home. You'd better start. Whar's your money?—in bank I think you said."

Horace nodded.

"Go and get it," the Texan continued; "and when you've passed it over you can take the cattle. One hundred and fifty times thirty is forty-five hundred; that's what you want, and a trifle to pay some boys to help you drive the cattle home."

Horace went to the bank (he had deposited his money here when last in Austin, there being no such institution as a bank in Helena), drew out the necessary amount, and returning to the hotel paid the purchase money and took a receipt.

Then the Texan told him to go and hire two cowboys to help him to drive the cattle home and to bring them out to the ranch, to which he himself would at once ride on and order his lads to get the animals together, so that no time need be wasted.

Horace had no difficulty in finding two mounted men willing to help him drive his purchase to his ranch, and attended by them he trotted off in hopes of overtaking his new friend. But he arrived at the field where the cattle were grazing without doing so, and furthermore on his arrival could perceive no sign of the Texan. He waited a few minutes, then said to one of the cowboys: "It's odd that Mr. Philpott isn't here. How can we get them out?"

"Can't do it," was the laconic reply. "Rope's too plentiful hereabouts to be driving away cattle without the owner's consent. I know old Philpott; he ain't to be trifled with. What you got to show you bought 'em?"

Horace held out his receipt and each of the cowboys looked at it.

"That's right enough," said one of them "he'll be here soon, I guess."

But they waited half an hour and he did not come, so Horace, thoroughly angry and impatient, smashed the lock on the gate and rode into the inclosure, followed by his two attendants. He had, he said, paid for the stock, and he was going to take them.

Then the three cantered off in different directions to bring the animals together. But while they were so employed the report of a rifle caused them to scan the country, and they perceived three men galloping toward them.

"Them's Philpott's boys," said one of Horace's new employes: "we'll wait for 'em."

And they sat still upon their horses until the three men, each holding a revolver in his right hand, rode up and asked in no very polite language what they were doing with the cattle.

"I'm going to take them to my ranch," said Greenfield. "I've bought and paid for them."

"Guess you ain't bought these animals, stranger," was the reply. "They belong to our old man, and when he hears you've bin tryin' to drive 'em off he'll be in favor of showing you how we treat cattle thieves out here. But you don't look like a thief, nohow!"

"He ain't no thief," said another; "he's a green furrier."

"Did these cattle belong to Ezekiel Philpott?" asked Horace.

"They did and they do," was the reply.

"I have his receipt for the purchase money," continued Greenfield, offering them the paper.

The three cowboys read it. Then the one who appeared to be the leader said, "Stranger, you'll have to come and see the old man. His name's Ezekiel Philpott, but he never signed that receipt, for a bullet happened into his elbow two weeks ago, and he's bin in bed ever since. He couldn't hold a pen to save his life."

With vague feelings of uneasiness, the Hon. Horace allowed himself to be conducted to the residence of Ezekiel Philpott, which was about three miles away. Arrived here he was left in charge of the others while the leader went and explained the situation to his master. In a few minutes the young Englishman was summoned to the presence of Mr. Philpott, whom he found lying in bed. After saluting Horace with a savage glare, he said:

"Perhaps, young man, you can explain why you tried to drive off my cattle? Sam says you bought 'em from some one."

"And so I did," Horace replied, and at once gave a full account of the transaction.

"Waal, stranger," said the wounded ranchman, "that beats anything I ever heerd! That man as you paid that money to ain't got no more to do with them cattle than the emperor of China has. Now, look here, my lad. I'm nigh on to 60 years old, and I've been out here thirty, and what I don't know about these parts ain't worth knowing. Take my advice. Go home and stay thar. This ain't no country for you, and ef you stay you'll only come to grief. A man as will give $5,000 to a stranger for a scrap of paper ain't going to get on hereabouts. You shall sleep here to-night, stranger, and I'll treat you hospitable; but, take my advice, set out for home to-morrow."

And when that night Horace lay on the hard bed in the old Texan's house, the rectory on his father's estate appeared in a more desirable light than it ever had before, and he came to the conclusion that a country parson's life was better than a ranchman's. He has returned home without the anticipated fortune and minus his aunt's legacy.—True Flag.

COLLEGE YARNS.

Work That Daring Boys in School Will Often Undertake for Fun.

A HAZING PARTY THAT FAILED.

How a Professor's Horse was Raised in the Air.—Praying for Three Hours to Save the Crowd.

"Talking of hazing," said a university club man the other evening, "I'm here with some emphasis and accent to say it is not always a success. I was with a party of students once who, having set their academic hearts on hazing a rough and uncouth specimen from Vermont, repaired to his room about 11 o'clock one night to perform these rites. There were seven of the invaders, including myself, and we silently collected in the corridor outside the freshman's door. In order to be impressive in our entrance at a given signal we hurled ourselves against the portal and burst it in.

"I recall a feeling of pride as the door went in at the success of this first step, but nothing distinctly afterward. In the dim, religious light which sifted through the curtains from the swinging moon we beheld a long, sparse and meager being who flew out of bed and fell upon us. He was silent as a bulldog, but quick and ferocious as a cat. I never saw such a creature. I got a blow which I vividly remember comparing on the spot to a flail, a comparison, by the way, which I do not now alter or regret. The whole affair did not last ten minutes, and its close found myself and the other hazers battered and bruised and out in the hall.

RAISING THE HORSE.

"The Vermonter did not even attempt to close the door after us, such was his contempt for our prowess. He went over to a washstand while we consulted in the hall. We did not go back in his room. We could, of course, but we saw it would consume a great deal of time and the hour was late. So we gave it up.

"'Say, you Vermont man!' I said as we were about to leave, 'I trust you are not mean enough to report this to the faculty?'

"'Not at all,' he said with a cheery laugh. 'I like it. Come again any time you please. Your attentions are very gratifying to my pride.'"

"Where I was," said the listener, "we had a little fun one night—perfectly bloodless, however—which in its results always rose an insolvable mystery to the profound head of the institution. The professor had an old, fat, sluggish horse, which abode in a small pasture or paddock close to the college. One night a party of us repaired thither and proceeded by means of rails laid square, just as children build cob houses, all decked over or floored with some two inch planks which lay convenient, to build a platform. We raised it at first perhaps eighteen inches from the ground. Then we built a second close beside the first and made it three feet high.

"The horse was led up on the first and from there to the second. Then, taking off the plank floor, we added about four rails to each of the four sides and carried the first platform to about eighteen inches higher than the one on which the horse stood. This was planked over and the old horse invited to climb on it, which he did in a docile, oppositionless way very winning to our young hearts. Well, we continued this alteration business, leading the old war horse from one pedestal to the other until he was twelve feet in the air, perched on an eminence of rails and planks.

"This suited the most fastidious of the party, and we tore away the rail and plank construction the horse had no further use for and piled it carefully back in its several parts just where we got it. The old horse, who seemed to realize his position didn't stroll about any, but made the best of it, lying down and going to sleep. The professors were much astounded in the morning and never were able to figure it out. They sent to a neighboring town for help and got the horse down with a derrick.

PRAYING AGAINST FIRE.

"Another time," continued the raconteur, "a party of us had been out on that sacred night Halloween tearing off gates and signs and otherwise disporting ourselves after the fashion of college youth the world around. We had brought about a cord of broken store signs up to Jim Martin's room, and were merrily burning them in his big fireplace. The ceremonies were at their height when two or three professors, excited to the movement by indignant townspeople, whose signs being ravished had followed us to the college gates, rapped loudly at the door for admission. Something had to be done, as it would never do to let in the professors and those broken evidences of our guilt around.

"A man by the name of Jack Nesbit was equal to the pinch, however. It was a rule of the college that no professor should be denied entrance to a room, no matter the hour, unless the occupant was engaged in prayer. In event of the present progress of this religious exercise the professor was unable to wait until the 'amen,' and could in nowise complain. At the first rap Nesbit broke into prayer. In a loud, sonorous tone he sought mercy for himself and his companions. Continuing he beleagured the throne of grace in behalf of the college, as well as the professors, singly and in a body. Next the students came in for note by name and in bulk, as well as every attache of the place to the small person who cleaned knives and forks in the kitchen. No one was slighted or overlooked. Then Nesbit went for the government and prayed for the nation at large; then the president and his pressing needs were named, and divinity was pleaded with for their fulfillment; then all the departments and various officers of state, and when they were exhausted all the states, beginning with Maine and ending with California, were interceded for.

"After this Jack went to Europe, and, beginning with England, related the necessities of each government and sought their satisfaction. From there he went to Asia, to Africa, then to South America, and so on until he was drifting among the islands which dot the southern seas. Meanwhile the rest of us turned stokers and crowded the signs into the fireplace, where they roasted and leaped almost to the limits of general conflagration. Just as Jack was landing at Auckland the last splinter went up in smoke and the disgusted professors were let in. The prayer was almost three hours long, and as the teachers filed in Nesbit closed with some quotation from St. Mark which refers to those who, seeking a sign, shall find it not."—Kansas City Star.

Familiarities of Young Girls.

There is very little left to call the people you love if you lavish words of affection on every stranger whom you meet. If you call a young woman whom you have known just half an hour "Dear," and one whom you have known three days "Darling," there will be no tender endearing term for you to address to those who have your whole heart. Girls who are not of necessity gushing are often apt to speak in the most familiar manner. Good speech is certainly pure silver, but there are so many times when silence would outweigh it and be perfect gold. To tell of one's family affairs, to tell of one's joys and worries to some one who has a sympathetic manner and seems to invite it, is at once a weakness and a misfortune. To write a letter in which you use endearing terms, in which you discuss personal matters, is more than merely indiscreet—it is dangerous.

Don't you think if you are a bit familiar in speech or with the pen to a man that he is going to more than meet this half way? Don't you think if you call him by his first name he is very apt to call you by yours, and perhaps before people whom you do not care to have think lightly of you? If you permit him to speak of things not usually discussed do not imagine for one moment he is going to regard the conversation as confidential. He will always tell it to somebody, and you can then imagine how much further down in the esteem of two people you have gone. Don't permit any man to be familiar with you to the extent of calling you "Old girl," or citing you as "One of the boys." You don't belong among the boys, and you shouldn't be counted there. Don't let any man, unless you are betrothed to him, kiss you. Lips are of little worth to John which have been pressed by Tom, Dick and Harry.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Pope Leo Detected the Trick.

I heard a charming story about the pope. When his holiness was first crowned he decided to insist upon many of the details of court etiquette which Pius IX had allowed to drift into desuetude. He had two brothers. One was the head of the family, Count Pecci, and the other was a priest, who afterward wore cardinal's robes. The pope sent the priest to bring his aged brother to pay his respects. On the way to the Vatican the old gentleman kept shaking his head and expressing wonder at the fortune that had befallen his family.

"I never thought that Joachim would turn out so well," he cried. "I never thought my younger brother had it in him. He didn't seem to have enough ability."

"See here," said the priest, "you must not go on in that way when you enter the presence of the holy father. He is no longer a private person. He is the pope to you as well as to everybody else. You must kneel and kiss his foot."

"What! I kiss my younger brother's foot? Never! He is my younger brother Joachim and I am proud of him, but I will never kiss his foot. He will never be anything else to me but my younger brother."

By dint of exertion the count finally agreed when he reached the antechamber of the reception room that he would bend low over the pope's slipper and excuse himself from kneeling and kissing it on the ground that his legs were gouty. When the white haired elder brother murmured this excuse and bowed profoundly the pope shrewdly detected the trick and understood the motive. His holiness quietly raised his foot up to the lips of his astonished relative, and the count surrendered on the spot and kissed it.—Cor. Sheffield (Eng.) Telegraph.

For Spooney Maidens.

There are many ways by which the stars respond to inquirers respecting the secrets of the future. One of the simplest is to take the first star you notice, count the number between it and the Milky Way, halve that, and it will give you the number of letters in your husband's name. Another is to select the number of stars in a constellation, add it to the date of your birth, and divide the whole by twelve, keep the result in your mind until you shake hands with some one, then add the letters in that person's name to what you have, divide by seven, and you will get the number of months before you will be married. If it should run over thirteen and be even you'll marry a young man, if uneven an old one. If over twice thirteen and even he will be red headed, if uneven he will be bald and very rich.

To tell whether your future husband will be fond of you and trusting, or jealous and tired of you, select a star as you first cast up your eyes, and count the number between it and the "dipper" or "cancer" and add thirteen. Halve that, and if the result be even he will adore you, if uneven you will have no peace. Clouds shooting across the sky while you are counting mean rivals. Keep on and do not be interrupted by them.—New York Press.

They Arrest Americans.

The ex-Empress Eugenie had quite an adventure some time ago en route from Liege to Cologne. She was sitting in a first class railway compartment when a man entered, and producing a pipe began to smoke industriously. The guard represented to the fellow that the compartment was reserved for ladies, but this warning had no effect upon the ruffian, who continued to smoke so fast that the air in the compartment soon became intolerable and the ex-empress fainted away. At the next stop she was removed to another compartment. When told who the lady was the man expressed satisfaction that he had smoked her out. "I've paid my fare and I'm as good as anybody else," said he. Strangely enough the fellow was not arrested for violation of the rule prohibiting intrusion into and smoking in the compartment reserved for ladies. It is said, however, that railway regulations in Europe are enforced in the cases of foreign patrons only. Let an American break the pettiest rule and he is mulcted promptly and to the very limit.—Eugene Field in Chicago News.

The Size of Men's Hats.

Some interesting facts were furnished some time ago by English hatters respecting the size of men's hats. The size is a mean between the length and breadth of the hat; thus, measurements of seven inches and a half by six inches and a half would give No. 7, and so on. The usual size for an adult Englishman is a No. 7. Germans have round heads, Malays small ones. The heads of Portuguese average from six inches and seven eighths to seven inches; those of Spaniards are a little larger. The heads of Japanese excel the English average.—Exchange.

TOOTHACHE.

A Dentist Diagnoses the Pain and Gives a Few Effective Remedies.

DISEASE FROM UNSOUND TEETH.

The Aid of a Dentist is Required for Most Aches.—Warm Water as a Cure for Simple Toothache.

Perhaps there is nothing within the sphere of dentistry about which the people know so little as toothache.

To the question, "What is a toothache?" I shall now give a reply which will be comprehensive, and, I hope useful, in that it shall divest the subject of much of the mystery in which it is now enveloped, at least for the layman.

What is health? To reply in a brief dogmatism we may say, "a man enjoys health when he is not unpleasantly conscious of any special part of his body." Therefore a perfectly healthy, sound tooth never aches. But a tooth may be healthy and yet not sound, and thus we come to appreciate the simplest kind of toothache. Your little girl says, "Whenever I eat a caramel my tooth aches." You take her to the dentist and he tells you that the teeth are all healthy. Why, then, the ache?

We allow our children to do with their teeth what we will not permit our servants to do with our china; yet the enamel is almost as friable as porcelain. Hot chocolate after ice cream, hot coffee after iced watermelon, hot rolls and iced milk—all such extremes of temperature result in cracking or checking the enamel. Cracking nuts, hard candy balls, ice, etc., may produce the same result. By capillary attraction these tiny crevices, which lead down to the sensitive dentine, are filled with the fluids of the mouth.

Now eat caramels, and the sugar dissolving enters the crevices also and soon ferments, forming acids which irritate the dentine and produce this kind of toothache. It is more common with children, because the enamel of the temporary set is more easily cracked. The best course is to avoid such use or abuse of the teeth, but with the ache present the remedy is simple. Fill the mouth with warm water, and in a moment the pain will pass away, the fluid washing away the irritant and the heat acting as a soothing agent.

Next we have toothache proper, that kind which arouses us from slumber. The pulp (or, as it is erroneously called, the "nerve") is jumping. Decay has advanced until it has reached the pulp, whereupon, exactly as in the first condition, the acid results of fermentation irritate the sensitive organ and produce pain. The jumping is the passage of the blood through engorged vessels, forcing the walls of the capillaries against the nerve filaments, so that with each pulsation of the heart there is a responsive throb. Some dentists attempt to save such pulps alive, and it is possible to do so, but it is a hazardous undertaking, and rarely successful if the disturbance has continued for any length of time.

The best procedure is to destroy the pulp, remove it and fill the root canal. This, of course, forces the patient to a dentist, and great care should be taken to choose a skillful man, because there is no one thing in dentistry more often bungled than this apparently simple killing of a pulp and subsequent filling of the roots and crown. If, however, the pain is excessive and occurs at night, or when a dentist is not readily accessible, a drop of any essential oil on a pledget of cotton placed in the cavity will give temporary relief.

Use oil of cloves, peppermint, sassafras, camphor, turpentine, but do not use creosote or carbolic acid. Either of these latter may be employed by the dentist, but in the hands of a patient the usual result is that an excess is placed on the cotton and the gums are more or less badly burned. The least part of a drop is all sufficient. Cover with a second piece of cotton. This kind of toothache is the only sort that can be relieved by "toothache drops" or other medicament to be applied in the cavity of decay.

Next we have what the dentist knows as pericementitis. This is an inflammation of the pericementum, which is the soft tissue that surrounds the root. It may occur in a tooth which has a cavity or in one which has been filled, but in any case it never occurs in a tooth having a pulp that is alive. Pericementitis is the dentist's bete noire, because it so frequently is difficult to control. The tooth is sore to the touch, is felt first on closing the teeth together, that is, it has elongated by rising from its socket, and the pain is a dull ache more or less severe, worse at night and continuous.

If the tooth has been filled the chances are that the root has not been thoroughly cleansed of septic matter. In this case immediate relief may sometimes be obtained by removal of the filling, allowing the escape of gases from the root. If it is an unfilled tooth then there is dead pulp present which must be removed. In nearly all such cases appropriate treatment will save the tooth and restore it to normal health.

This usually necessitates several treatments with disinfectants and the pain may continue for several days. If a dentist is not accessible apply iodine to the gum over the root, take twenty grains of bromide of potassium, or ten grains each of bromide of potassium and of bromide of sodium; a hot mustard footbath frequently does good, but everything is temporary except thorough cleansing and medication of the root.

If this condition is neglected, or if a dead pulp is left in a tooth for any length of time, the inevitable result is alveolar abscess. This disturbance varies from a small opening in the gum through which a constant discharge of pus goes on, without pain, to a sudden swelling about the root which must be finally lanced to evacuate a quantity of pus. The pain may be excessive. There may be an anchylosis of the jaw, and in the lower jaw the pus sometimes burrows downward, discharging outside under the jaw bone. In alveolar abscess it is frequently good practice to extract.

Too many such teeth are kept in the mouth, the patients constantly swallowing pus with their food, producing blood poisoning and a condition sometimes mistaken for malaria. Occasionally, however, a radical cure may be effected by a skillful dental surgeon. The treatment consists of thoroughly disinfecting the canal and extirpating the sac from the end of the root. It may be necessary to amputate the end of the root, cutting off the part which is diseased and removing it through the gum. When extraction is decided on it should be done without delay. The idea that the operation must be postponed until abatement of the swelling is absurd.

The Eagle as a Symbol.

In Europe there are still the eagles of Austria, Russia and Germany, besides others pertaining to minor principalities. An able writer remarks that "owing to the restoration of the western empire during the rule of the Byzantine Cæsars the world has never since the time of Augustus been without one or two emperors of the Romans. The present Austrian emperor, though holding scarcely a province of Adrian's, is the direct successor of Charlemange, who was crowned in Rome, emperor of the Romans, the sixty-ninth from Augustus." The czar of Russia bears the double headed eagle, which was assumed by the Grand Duke Ivan Basilovitz, who in 1472 married Sophia, daughter of Thomas Paleologus and niece of the last emperor of Byzantium, Constantine XIV.

The German emperor reigns over some Roman provinces and bears a single headed eagle with the crown of Charlemange. The single headed eagle, assumed with the imperial title by the first Napoleon Bonaparte, sets forth the union of the whole Roman empire as the traditional aim of his family. All this strikingly harmonizes with the admitted fact of the continuance to the present time, though in a divided state, of the Roman empire, and suggests thoughts as to what may be the ultimate meaning of the words, "Wheresoever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together."—Westminster Review.

Real Musk.

Musk—that is, the genuine grain from the musk deer—is now worth its weight in gold, so rare has it become, the wild eyed little animal from which it is obtained having been very nearly exterminated from its Asiatic haunts. A full grown musk deer will yield about an ounce of the grains, which are found in a sac in the skin of its abdomen. The grains are no larger than a pea, and some of them are as small as a pin's head. The musk is sold in the market in the pods or sacs in which it is found, but is frequently adulterated. So many of the deer have been killed before reaching maturity that the average musk bag imported, either Chinese or Russian, will not exceed half an ounce in weight.

The adulteration of musk is made possible by the use of a seed known as the musk seed. It grows in India. The Chinese musk is prized the most but is more open to suspicion than the Russian, which is seldom found with the sac broken. There are many artificial musks, and our common muskrat yields a pod that is the only near approach to the genuine imported musk.—Interview in New York Evening Sun.

On the Wrong Track.

He—Congratulate me, Miss Bella. In a few days Miss Goldthwaite will be mine.

She—I am glad to hear it; but I didn't know you were——

He—Of course you didn't, nor any one else. Didn't want any competition, see? But it's all fixed now. She'll be worth ten thousand a year to me.

She—Really? The name's unfamiliar. New York family?

He—No; Kentucky family, and one of the best. Sired by Bang Up, dam Queen Elizabeth—why you must remember her. She made 2:13 last season and not half trained at that.

She—Oh, I thought you were speaking of a marriage engagement.

He—Now, Miss Bella, that's pretty hard. I know I spend half my time in the stable, but that's no reason you should take me for an ass.—Life.

Dangers of a Meat Diet.

The evils of a meat diet are being appreciated by many high livers in cities, and these are being counteracted partly by the wealthy in adding more fruits and vegetables to their tables during the winter. The cheapness of meat and a peculiar craving which the system seems to have for meat have gradually made it common for city people to live almost entirely off meat in the winter months.

Meat is eaten three times a day in quantities, and the excessive use of such a diet is that rheumatic and gout temperaments are acquired. These temperaments are on the increase, and they are largely due to the excessive use of meat. Lime water counteracts the evils of this diet to a large extent.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

A Few Ideas.

Dr. Hooke, one of the founders of the Royal society, and a mathematician of credit and renown, throws out a fanciful calculation on the number of ideas of which the human mind, in the aggregate, is capable: he arrives at a total of 3,655,760,000. We should suppose that so respectable a figure is not yet exhausted, and though a time must come when nothing new will be left under the sun, we may still hope (some of us) to catch a floating idea or two, of the practical kind, for current use.—Gentleman's Magazine.

Why He Went to Toronto.

Not long ago a friend asked the Rev. Dr. Wild, once mentioned as a possible successor to Mr. Beecher, why he went to Toronto. "I might say," he replied, "that it was a call from God, but the real fact is I am paid $2,000 a year more than I was getting."—New York Tribune.

A BABIES' FOOT.

Similarity of the Sole of an Infant's Foot and Palm of the Hand.

THEORIES OF THE EVOLUTIONISTS.

Investigations Show That the Young Foot has Characteristics Tha are Prehensile.

Bret Harte's miner, who, after his interview with the babe whose advent had been a matter of such interest to the occupants of Roaring Camp, held up his finger and remarked, "He wrastled with it," is now cited by the learned in science as having expressed a significant biological truth. The singular clinging power of an infant's fingers must have been observed by any one who has been subjected to that species of violence. The babe can have no use for any such strength, and this excess of power is said by the evolutionists to be a quality which the race acquired when it lived among the branches of trees, and has not yet lost.

Dr. Louis Robinson has published an account of some experiments which he had made upon this subject. These experiments were made in the cases of more than sixty children, all of whom were under a month old, and at least half of whom had been less than one hour in the world. With two exceptions all of these babies were able to hold onto a finger or a stick three-quarters of an inch in diameter by their hands, hanging as if from a horizontal bar, and sustaining the whole weight of their bodies for at least ten seconds.

The same writer has contributed to The Nineteenth Century an article on the foot of a baby, with the intention of showing that its characteristics are prehensile. He says that there are two classes of feet, those which are used only for progression and those which have more complex functions. In the first class come all the hoofed animals. The construction of the foot in this class is simple, as its functions are simple. It has to sustain the weight of the animal, and is therefore very robust, a characteristic for which man has found an artificial substitute in the boot. Among feet of the second kind would be those of cats, for instance, which have, besides the power of locomotion, claws with which to climb.

The apes, by reason of the very complex functions and construction of the foot, would have a special claim to be put in this class. Climbing with claws is simply walking, with the added power to drive the claws into the bark. But the feet of a monkey in the branches of a tree running away from a cat or a snake have much more difficult and complicated offices to perform. The foot of a monkey must be prepared to seize at almost any angle a branch of a tree with a firm grasp or in an instant to clasp a spray of fine twigs and cling to them.

Now, although the foot of man is at present used only for locomotion, it has the same complicated system of muscles that the hand has. It has indeed the same muscles, there being only one muscle in the hand, a small one with no attachment to the bone, for which there is not a corresponding muscle in the foot. But how is it that these muscles, which are for the most part useless, remain a part of the human anatomy? The answer of the evolutionist is that any part of the animal economy which has become inbred remains after it has ceased to be useful, unless it should be injurious, and the human foot is said not to be injurious.

But the feet of very young infants have a resemblance to those of monkeys which adult feet do not have. In the first place, the toes of babies are more easily moved than those of adults. The great toe is shorter than the second and third, and is separated from the other toes by a wide interval. A very young baby often holds his foot very like a fist, the four outer toes being bent downward and showing a distinct knuckle on the other upper side, and the great toe being bent and turned inward across the sole. When the foot is in this position the great and little toes approach under the others, and Dr. Robinson has seen one baby in whom they very nearly touched. Any slight irritation of the skin of the sole of the foot will cause the infant to close the toes as if to grasp the object which has caused the irritation.

Moreover, a close examination of the sole of an infant's foot shows that it contains lines just like those of the palm of the hand. When the toes are bent downward these become creases, showing the natural folding places of the integument, when the act of grasping takes place. Dr. Robinson has examined these lines on the feet of a very large number of infants, first taking photographs of the feet and later (which he found much better) impressions of the infants' feet on paper. Some of these impressions show very distinct lines which the writer says correspond closely to the lines which in palmistry are the "line of the heart," the "line of head" and the "line of life."

These lines disappear almost as soon as the children begin to walk. They can scarcely be seen at fourteen months, and are only present in a few cases after the infant has reached two years. In adults no trace is to be seen of them when the foot is at rest, and only the faintest indications when the toes are bent to the utmost. There is no analogous case among the other animals of handlike lines existing on the feet in infancy and disappearing later.

But do the lines which Dr. Robinson has found on the feet of newborn infants exist on the feet of monkeys? The lines on a baby's foot are handlike, and indicate a prehensile utility, and a monkey's feet are of course prehensile, but are the lines identical? The writer admits that he has met with some difficulty in pursuing his researches regarding monkeys' feet, monkeys objecting strenuously. Moreover, the lines differ greatly in the different families of monkeys. But it was found that the higher the ape the more do its foot-lines resemble those of a newborn infant, these investigations tending to confirm the evolutionist's theory of the origin and history of man.—New York Times.

Electric Launches.

An English company has sixteen pleasure launches plying on the Thames, all worked by electricity, and charging stations have been built at various points on the bank of the river, so that if a pleasure party is delayed or chooses to extend its excursion, all it has to do is to put into the bank and recharge its batteries. The large fleet of electric launches now on the Thames include many private boats.—New York Telegram.

Russia's Elderly Infants.

There is no danger that a Russian will not obtain his full growth before he comes of age, for the law of the empire regards him as an infant until he is twenty-six years old.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

Irv. H. Mulholland,
EDITOR & PROPRIETOR.
PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 18..... 1892.

There is now room in the market for a large supply of very small knotholes. Every boss let out of business needs one.

It was a grand uprising against the plundering of many to enrich a few, but the reform would be better if pushed a little farther. It is not enough to stop plunderers in their career. They ought to be made to restore to the rightful owners a part, if not the whole of the stolen property.

In their fervid thankfulness and patriotic pride for the grand results of the election Democrats should remember that without the help of tens of thousands of Republicans who were just enough to prefer the welfare of their country to the success of their party, such success could not have been achieved. The fact of being right is of higher worth than any success that fact could win.

Now that the tariff robbers are totally overthrown, Republican papers are proclaiming their real convictions on the tariff question. The Sacramento "Record-Union" says: "The Republican party has lost because it has listened to the gospel of high protection and followed the leaders who led in that direction to its ruin. The duty of a Government to foster home industry is one thing, and the robbery which goes on under the name of high protection is quite another." Severe chastisement is the only way by which many men as well as children can be turned from evil courses. The great body of Republican voters are wiser and far more honest than the selfish politicians who brought such ruin upon the party.

There is now a chance that the railroads may be compelled to pay the very large amount of taxes long owing in this State. The poor man who owns a little house and lot, an even the woman who toils all day and far into the night to earn food by her sewing maching are compelled to pay taxes to the last cent. Surely the millionaires will not be allowed longer to defy law and outrage justice by refusing to pay even the very unequal amount of taxes assessed upon their vast wealth. It was not for a mere change of administration but for the solid fruits of reform that such a total overthrow of machine politics was effected in the election. If the Democrats in Congress prove wise enough to follow the wise counsel and unselfish devotion of the great leader of the party, justice will be done to all.

A most gratifying fact in connection with the election is the vote on the proposition to require an educational qualification on the part of the voters. In the large cities and towns the vote at the precincts where the great bulk of working people live was nearly unanimous in favor of the requirement. It is only the poor who have anything to dread from corruption in politics; the rich alone are gainers, and they only, can corrupt. The vote shows that working people know where their safety lies and will do all in their power to protect the ballot box. As it is not among the millionaires but among the toiling masses that Democracy has its greatest strength, this vote on the educational qualification will dispose of the old lying taunt and slander that the poor are opposed to reforms and want brute force alone to rule at the ballot-box.

Antidotes for Snake Poison.

The effect of snake bite depends partly on the condition of the snake and partly on that of the person bitten and the part attacked. No effectual antidote has yet been discovered. Ammonia and permanganate of potassium will not suffice, although a solution of the latter will take away the poisonous property of the snake's venom if it be mixed therewith. Immediate amputation of a bitten toe or finger is the best course, as the delay of a few seconds may suffice to convey the poison into the patient's circulation.

If from the nature of the part bitten amputation cannot be performed, a very tight ligature applied after cauterization and sucking the part is the best course, and the administration of stimulants is generally recommended.—Quarterly Review.

Rice and Wheat at Weddings.

Throwing rice and wheat at a wedding is a relic of an old Roman custom, and has probably been common in England since Roman times. Brand gives several authorities for it. Friend refers to the case of the bride of Henry VII at Bristol in 1486, when wheat was thrown upon her with the greeting, "Welcome and good luck!"

Rice is used similarly at weddings in India, and the substitution of this grain for wheat in our own country of late years may be partly due to that fact; but where wheat cannot readily be come at rice would naturally suggest itself as a substitute.—Notes and Queries.

BEING DECAPITATED.

AN INTERESTING QUESTION THAT MAY NEVER BE ANSWERED.

Are the Movements of the Head and Face After Decapitation Involuntary or Are They Attended with Some Slight Action of the Will—Some Experiments.

The question of the duration of consciousness in the brain of criminals after execution by hanging or by the guillotine is being discussed with greater interest than ever since Anastay, the murderer of Baroness Dellard, paid his debt to society. It is said that this remarkable criminal sent to his brother a letter on the subject as follows:

The separation of my body and that which constitutes my thinking being cannot so soon be accomplished. I believe there is a survival of about an hour. Come, then, Leon, be present at my execution and insist that my head be given to you. Call me with your voice and my eyes will reply to you.

This is but the repetition of a popular belief that has prevailed for centuries. There is a legend of a state execution in England at an epoch when the ax and block were in use, which sets forth that after the instrument had fallen the person whose head was on the block exclaimed, "You have missed me!" to which the executioner replied with a slight kick that sent the head rolling to a distance. The story never gained much credence, but is still worthy of discussion. Its truth or falsity would depend on the possibility of the instrument being so thin and sharp that the walls of the veins would not be displaced, in which case the circulation of the blood might continue for a few seconds, and whether consciousness might continue for a moment after the vertebræ of the neck was severed. This last difficulty would be the greatest, since utter unconsciousness is supposed to be simultaneous with the severing of the spinal cord or the breaking of the neck. In any event, scientists who have taken the trouble to study the faces of the guillotined for a few seconds after the fatal stroke, or who have made experiments with decapitated animals, do not favor the theory.

Several French physicians, and among them Dr. Paul Loye, now deceased, but once a professor at the Sorbonne, have experimented with dogs, using for their hanging or decapitation machinery like that employed in public executions. The dog was chosen for the experiments as having the most mobile face and being able to reproduce the movements which in rare cases have been observed in human subjects. Persons whom this treatment of dumb animals might revolt are begged to remember that the suffering is much less than in vivisection, since these methods of execution are generally recognized as producing the least pain. The guillotine employed by Dr. Loye was similar to that used for the execution of ordinary criminals in France. It consisted of a triangular knife or ax, surmounted by a mass of lead weighing over twenty pounds and falling over six feet upon the neck of the animal, which was severed at the third vertebra. The phenomena observed were similar to those remarked by other French and by foreign savants whose experiments have been less elaborate.

At the moment the head was detached from the body the mouth opened wide, as if the animal was making an extraordinary effort at inhalation. The tongue was applied to the lower part of the mouth and underwent a brief period of agitation. The eyelids were closed with light contractions. Then the eyes were opened and rolled from side to side and top to bottom, the pupils in the meantime gradually contracting. At the same time the jaws were opened and violently closed, and the face was rapidly convulsed. This was followed by changes at the corners of the mouth, vibration of the nostrils, trembling of the lips and erection of the ears. The ensemble of these movements constituted a series of horrible grimaces like those seen on the face of the guillotined, and seemed to express the most intense agony. If the cornea of the eye was touched the eyelids closed, but if an object, no matter of what kind, was placed before the eye there was no movement. Neither did crying nor whistling into the ears of the dog appear to cause the slightest sensation. The pinching of the tongue caused a slight shrinking of that organ. Although the pupil of the eye was contracted, the approach of a light rendered the orifice still smaller.

These phenomena occupy about ten seconds, and are followed by a period of repose continuing to the fifteenth or twentieth second, during which the mouth rests closed and the eyes open and without movement. At the end of this time the mouth opens and closes quickly, the nostrils dilate and contract. During this time, although the irritation of the cornea has caused a slight winking, neither whistling in the ear nor touching the tongue or nostrils with ammonia or cologne has been able to produce any effect. The opening and closing of the mouth resemble yawning, and are reproduced a dozen times, after which the motions gradually cease. Then the cornea loses its sensibility to the touch, though, half a minute having elapsed, the yawning is still active. The pupil of the eye dilates at the approach of light, but does not contract, and the cornea loses its glistening appearance. At the end of two minutes the yawning and other phenomena have ceased, ending in more contraction of the fibers, and the head takes a corpselike look.—San Francisco Chronicle.

Coffee Good for the Voice.

When making a speech Lord Salisbury never drinks anything, neither does the present leader of the house, and the same may be said of John Morley and Mr. Chamberlain. Sir Charles Russell, the leader of the English bar, on the occasion of his two days' speech before the Parell commission, drank nothing but hot coffee, which he declared was not only good for the voice but an excellent stimulant.—Exchange.

A Physician's Fees.

South Africa responds to modern innovations. A recent traveler in Kaffirland tells this incident:

As we were upsaddling, there passed us a man driving a small flock of goats and several head of cattle. This was the husband of a lady physician who is ruining the practice of the local witch doctors, and he was taking home his wife's fee for attending a patient.—Youth's Companion.

FAIRYLAND.

Under the branches they went together,
The blossoming branches that break the sky,
All in the morn of the young, sweet weather,
When softly the green on the hills doth lie;
And Dorothy thought it was over the meadow,
And Cicely said it was close by the spring,
But Polly was sure that the woodland's shadow
Sheltered that magical fairy ring.

So over the meadow they swiftly hied them—
Oh, but the bird in the blue sang sweet!
They saw not the blush of the brier beside them,
The violets smiling beneath their feet.
Long by the spring they lingered and listened,
'Twas a diadem set in a mossy rim,
And oh, the beauty that clustered and glistened
In frail ferns falling about its brim!

They sought in the wood for a wonder revealing,
And saw not the leaves in a net o'erhead.
Oh, but the song through the pinetops stealing,
And oh, that hush down the dim ways shed!
Then, when the sun leaned lower to find them,
Homeward they wandered a sorrowful way,
And knew not the land they were leaving behind them,
The rare new land of a young June day!

But Dorothy thinks it is over the meadow,
And Cicely says it is close by the spring;
While Polly is sure that the woodland's shadow
Shelters the magical fairy ring!

Theatrical Superstition.

Among country companies superstitions are more varied and extended than among metropolitan ones, and are of course more blindly and religiously adhered to. If, on entering a town where the next "stand" is to be made, a graveyard is visible on the right side of the railway track, the country manager's heart swells with bright anticipations. But if, on the contrary, the tombstones loom up on the left of the road, he becomes depressed, as he takes the fact as a warning that his "business" will be small during his engagement in that place. Such a manager will be apt to give some man or boy a free pass to the theater on a first night, as he would fear a run of ill luck in case a woman should chance to enter the house before a member of the opposite sex had found his way within.—Chicago Post.

How Mines Are Salted.

The gullibility of persons who buy mines has passed into a proverb. It is said that such properties have actually been salted with half melted silver dollars and sold to investors, who did not realize that the precious metal was not found in nature with the stamp of the mint upon it. Undoubtedly the most scientific method of accomplishing this sort of swindle is to apply the silver in the shape of a nitrate solution. When it is ready for use some salt is put into it and it is squirted over the rock, the salt causing an immediate precipitation of the metal in a manner that is equally conspicuous and deceptive to the eye.—Kansas City Times.

The Indian Hunter's Stone.

The Indian hunter will cut the shape of an animal out of stone, have it "blessed" by the medicine man and believe it gives him good fortune in the chase of the beast represented. When he kills one he dips the fetich in the blood. Perhaps he wraps about it beads, signifying money, and attaches to it little arrowheads, which represent the executive function of slaughter. So as to secure as much help from the unknown as possible, he hangs charms all over his person.—Washington Star.

Cannot Be Both.

A good body is necessary to a satisfactory expression of the mentality. But no man can be a Daniel Webster mentally and a John L. Sullivan physically. The possibilities of either the mind or body can be fully developed only at the expense of the other. The college boy who becomes a great athlete will not be a great scholar. Genius is almost always associated with soft spots.—Troy Press.

A Novel Watch.

One of the most ingenious and inexpensive novelties of the day is a gun metal watch, keyless, and showing upon its face, through small apertures, the day, date, month and state of the moon. The watch requires only to be wound in the usual way, and when the hour of 12 o'clock—midnight—arrives, with a slight click the day and date change in a magic, although automatic, manner. — New York Journal.

Huge English Bedsteads.

The English four posted bedstead was a huge affair. There is one at one of the inns at Ware, a small market town near Hertford, which is large enough to hold a dozen people, and it is one of the curiosities of England. It is referred to in Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night."—Table Talk.

A SAFE VEHICLE.

I have traveled round the world,
Northward eighty-one degrees;
I have seen ice mountains hurled
Into stormy, surging seas.
To the summit I've ascended
Of the highest Alpine peak;
And one day my way I wended
From Ceylon to Mozambique.

I've explored with learned sages
Parthenons and temples Doric;
And seen relics of the ages
That we call the prehistoric.
I'm at home in Rome and Venice,
Paris, London, Aberdeen;
And I've danced and played lawn tennis
With the daughter of a queen.

I have seen the Arab manly
Entertaining in his tent;
Traveled all the way with Stanley
Through the darkest Continent;
Scaled those wondrous, storied cellars
In our own New Mexico,
Where the people called cliff dwellers
Lived so many years ago.

Yet in all my journeys never
Have I suffered harm's attack;
Never coach or car whatever
That I boarded left the track.
Never was I vexed or daunted
At hotel or foreign station,
For the ear in which I jaunted
Was my own imagination.
—J. Ellis Joy in St. Nicholas.

Climatic Changes.

The changes of terrestrial climate have been many and various. Myrtles and tree ferns once flourished in Greenland; coral insects built on the shores of Melville island; nautiluses sailed over what must then have been the tepid seas about Spitzbergen. But with the lapse of ages the scene changed, and worse than arctic rigors spread into regions now enjoying temperate climate. Possibly not for the first time. The Permian was certainly an inclement age, and its inclemency seems even to have reached the point of glaciation in the west of England and Ireland, yet it was preceded and succeeded by a long prevalence of tropical conditions.

These assuredly reigned without interruption, in north temperate and polar regions throughout the vast expanse of Tertiary time. Palms and cycads then sprang up in the room of oaks and beeches in England; turtles and crocodiles haunted English rivers and estuaries; lions, elephants and hyenas roamed at large over English dry land.—Edinburgh Review.

Yankee Thrift.

The Maine man who cannot turn his hand to another source of profit when one fails him is a scarce article. An engraver and carver of old time repute, in the palmy days of Maine shipbuilding, now a resident of Kittery, finding his occupation gone as a sculptor of figureheads for vessels, is engaged in making idols and graven images for the heathen! He has a large order that will employ most of his time for over two years, from a missionary just returned from Central Asia to this country. This missionary, by the way, is evidently something of a Yankee himself.—Kennebec Journal.

Soudanese Troops in Battle.

I was told a delightful story of one recent action in which the Soudanese troops took a prominent part. The enemy was under cover not far off, but the firing line of blacks were blazing away at him as fast as they could open and close their rifles. In vain their officers tried to stop them. The waste of ammunition threatened to become extremely serious, and their commanding officer, a Scotchman who had seen many fights with them, losing his temper, rode up and down behind the line cursing them with every abusive epithet in a fairly adequate vocabulary of Arabic invective, but entirely without effect. At last one of them happened to turn and discovered the beloved bey in evidently a very excited state of mind. He at once rose, ran back to him, and patting him reassuringly on the boot he said: "Don't be frightened, bey. It's all right. We're here. We'll take care of you!"

The Scotch bey, however, was equal to the occasion. He rode out through the line, and walked his horse up and down in front of the rifles. "Now," he said, "if you must fire, fire at me!" After this it is not surprising to read in dispatches that this officer has twice recently had his horse shot under him.—Contemporary Review.

Jay Gould's Book.

Occasionally some person knocks at the door of Jay Gould's office in the Western Union building with a copy of "The History of Delaware County, New York, by Jay Gould," to sell. An impression exists in the minds of many people that Mr. Gould is desirous of suppressing this publication as completely as possible, and that he will pay almost any price to get possession of the few stray copies that are left. Residents of Delaware county are authority for the statement that several years ago an agent of Mr. Gould's scoured that county for these books and bought nearly all of them at fancy prices. Whenever a copy of this particular history of Delaware county is displayed in that county at the present day the older residents will advise the owner, "Jist you take thet down ter New York, an Jay Gould'll give yer thirty or forty dollars fer it." It is certain that nobody in Mr. Gould's office ever heard of his paying any such price for one of those books. And nobody is able to explain why Mr. Gould should want to suppress the publication, unless it is that he thinks there is too much sentiment in it for a man of his present reputation. — New York Times.

The Unreasoning Crowd.

Speaking of the queer things to be seen on the streets, it is really astonishing how instinctively one person imitates another. A man with a passion for psychical research has been proving this by some experiments which are, to say the least of it, original. Going along about dusk the other night in advance of a small party of folk, he suddenly turned out into the muddy street, as if avoiding something in front. Unquestioningly every person behind did the same thing in spite of the mire.

It isn't likely that they felt the full humorous force of the incident in quite the way he did, however, when they saw him face about and walk calmly back in the beaten path. The sheep went to all the trouble of jumping over a bar of dust, to be sure, but it would really seem worth while if human beings could think a little more independently and for themselves. The truth of it is, it is just this blind unreasoning herding together that leads to half the accidents and panics which are cropping up on all sides.—Boston Transcript.

The Hirsch mine, the mines in Hunter's canyon and other mines in Beveridge district will also be examined with a view to work ores by the new process. Severely Injured.

W. R. Tibbetts of Big Pine met with a very severe accident last Saturday. He was at work with his team in the Inyo range getting out wood and while 'snaking' a log down a steep hillside he stumbled and fell behind the animal. The horse stopped at once, and stepping backward he trod upon the breast of the unfortunate man. There were others at work near by and they removed Mr. Tibbetts to the residence of J. M. Hay. Dr. I. J. Woodin was telegraphed for immediately and arrived the same evening. He reports two ribs broken on the left side and severe internal contusions. The doctor visited the injured man again on Monday and says he is much better and will survive his injuries.

Prof. S. P. Putnam is giving a series of free thought lectures through the Valley. He spoke at Independence on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings to large audiences. Mr. Putnam in his lectures did not advocate atheism, but simply the doctrine he professes to maintain, free-thought. To enact no Sunday law, effect an entire separation of the church and state, and let every man follow the bent of his own inclination.

THE ARIZONA KICKER.

A Timely Explanation—A Paying Investment—A Base Slander.

The last issue of The Arizona Kicker contained the following:

EXPLANATORY.—The absence of our society column for the last three issues seems to call for an explanation. The trouble was jealousy among the bonton. If we happened to make a five line announcement that Mrs. Col. Dash expected her brother-in-law direct from the California penitentiary on a certain date, and only a four line item to the effect that Mrs. Judge De Soto imported her bustle direct from Zanzibar, there was an ill feeling which stirred up the entire community.

WE BOOM.—While the towns about us have been bragging of their progress, we have kept quiet and got in our work without kicking up any cloud of dust. Brag is all right in its way, but we don't propose to come out with a double leaded, scare head article every time a citizen hangs a new front gate. Booms are good enough in their way, but there must be merit behind them.

IT PAYS.—Several months ago we established a grocery and feed store in connection with The Kicker. The New York World, Herald and other effete dailies of the metropolis predicted a dismal failure, but the result shows that they were mistaken. We figured that this other business would be just what was needed to distract our mind from the harassing thoughts of editorially running this country, and that we would be all the better and brighter for being occasionally interrupted in our literary labors.

The result has justified our predictions—and more. We were never in as good mental condition as now, while our sales have kept increasing week by week until we have been compelled to hire a clerk to assist us. The editorial entitled "Advice to the President" was written with more than a dozen interruptions to measure corn, draw molasses and sell clothes pins, and yet we will put it against anything which ever originated from the pen of the stuck up and exclusive New York editors.

OUR JEALOUS CONTEMPORARY.—The dyspeptic old excrescence who claims to edit the milk and mush publication down at the corner of Catfish alley is jealous of our advertising patronage. In a labored article this week in his poorly printed old apology he says that we practice bulldozing to bring advertising. What a liar! The Kicker practice bulldozing! The idea is laughable, and if he was worth minding we should walk down to his shanty and choke the assertion down his brazen throat.

There used to be several firms here which didn't believe in advertising. We couldn't make 'em believe in it until we went at it and found out that they were composed of gentlemen who had skipped from the east for barn burning, horse stealing, bigamy, embezzlement, etc. Then we wrestled with 'em, and they came to see that the life of trade was in using printers' ink. We simply convinced—not bulldozed. The efforts of our knock kneed contemporary to smirch the fair fame of The Kicker will simply call forth smiles of pity.—Detroit Free Press.

"German Syrup"

Mr. Albert Hartley of Hudson, N. C., was taken with Pneumonia. His brother had just died from it. When he found his doctor could not rally him he took one bottle of German Syrup and came out sound and well. Mr. S. B. Gardiner, Clerk with Druggist J. E. He used the great remedy—Boschee's German Syrup—for lung diseases.

GOD ONLY KNOWS.

Whither are going with hurrying feet
Forms that are passing to-night on the street?
Faces all sunny and faces all sad,
Hearts that are weary and hearts that are glad.
Eyes that are heavy with sorrow and strife,
Eyes that are gleaming with beauty and life;
Pictures of pleasure and crosses of care,
Going, all going, God only knows where!

Hands that have earnestly striven for bread,
Hands that are soiled with dishonor, instead;
Hearts that are tuned to a purpose sublime,
Hearts all discordant and jangled with crime.
Souls that are pure and as white as the snow,
Souls that are black as the midnight of woe;
Gay in their gladness or drunk in despair,
Going, all going, God only knows where!

Some to the feast, where the richest red wine
And the rarest of jewels will sparkle and shine.
Some in their hunger will wander and some
Will sleep, nor awaken when morning shall come.
The robed and the ragged, the foe and the friend,
All of them hurrying on to the end;
Nearing the grave with a curse or a prayer,
Going, all going, God only knows where!

HYGIENIC TREATMENT OF WRINKLES.

A New York Woman Has a Hundred Dollar Method of Eradication.

A New York woman has opened a magnificent boudoir where she is eradicating wrinkles at the rate of $100 per customer. That she will make an everlasting fortune, whatever becomes of the lines of time, goes without saying.

The conquering heroine receives her patron in a marble hall, where, seated in old ecclesiastical chair, with her feet on a prayer rug of venerable antiquity and holiness, an appointment is made for the course of twenty treatments and a check signed for payment in advance. Buttons precedes the lady to her carriage, for every woman who can afford to buy $100 worth of wrinkle wash is sure to have a carriage.

On the appointed day the customer is received by the parlor maid and conducted to the boudoir, where a French artiste, assisted by a couple of handmaids, takes her in charge. Barber fashion she is seated in a couch chair, wrapped in a lavender scented linen sheet and her face is washed hygienically.

What this process consists of is a secret past finding out. The owner of it, however, says few women know how to wash their faces.

Said she: "They seem to think that all that is necessary is to dabble with a little soap and water; others go to work with a Turkish towel and succeed in rubbing the skin off in spots; there are others who thump the very life out of the face by massage.

"Now, that the face is delicate is an admitted fact, and that it requires delicate handling is a natural inference; but that it is more exposed than the hands, and therefore requires more attention, is not credited or believed as a fact. It is nevertheless so. The face is dirty. There is only one place where it can be said to be free from dust, and that is on the sea, and even on shipboard it is smoke stained. But to know just how much dust and dirt lodges in the pores of the face it is only necessary to study the accumulations on the furniture, the pictures and everything in and about the houses we occupy.

"In washing the face good soap is used to clean the surface. Then several rinsings are required to remove the soap, and this done the face is steamed, not heated, but steamed to open every pore and remove the dust with which it may be clogged.

Four distinct treatments, requiring two weeks' time, are consumed in the preparation of the face. Then come eight days of manipulation by a specialist who understands how to pinch and slap the face without bruising or irritating the skin. In this process all flaccidity of muscle and flabbiness of the flesh is worked up until the face is firm. Various lotions and tonics are applied, and if there are blemishes, eruptions or discolorations they are treated until they disappear.

Then comes the attack on the lines and furrows that wrinkle the face of beauty. Baths are frequent, tonics are liberally applied, and after liquid stimulation a battery is brought in and an electric current turned into the well washed face. The effect of this is to quicken the circulation, brighten the color and so strengthen the muscles that they become infused with new life and take a new hold, as it were.

The administration of electricity is on the same principle that a surgeon charges a maimed or withered limb, if there is any life in it. This fair electrician claims that she can restore the smoothness to any face under sixty and add ten years of youth to any woman's appearance who is not dissipated or past the alloted three score years.

The beauty of the hygienic treatment lies in the total absence of cosmetics. Absolutely no make up is used. Nor is any attempt made to give maturity the promise even of the bloom of sixteen. The claim made is the removal of all lines, spots and discolorations from the face.—New York World.

Queen Victoria Observes Sunday.

After all, our grand old Victoria holds her own better than any of the rest of 'em. A remarkable woman is she! The Paris Figaro has been telling a lot of good stories about the old lady. One of these is to the effect that not long ago one of her majesty's ministers arrived at Balmoral with a portfolio of state papers which he said demanded immediate attention.

"But to-morrow is Sunday!" said the queen.

"That is true, your majesty," answered the minister; "but the affairs of state can not wait."

To this the queen vouchsafed no reply. Attending service the following morning in the royal chapel, this minister was somewhat enraged to hear an eloquent sermon preached on the subject of the fourth commandment. At luncheon the queen asked the minister how he liked the discourse, and then she added, "I asked the chaplain to preach from that text."

Of course his lordship said nothing more about the state papers, but as she bade him "good night" that evening the queen said: "I shall be ready to receive you and to sign the papers at 7 o'clock to-morrow morning; that will give you plenty of time to catch the next train to London."

Baked apples from which the core has been removed before cooking, and the space filled with sugar, make a dish quite nice for dessert. Bake the apples till thoroughly done, but not so much as to lose their shape. Serve in glass sauce dishes with cream and pulverized sugar, and it will be quite a different dish from that sometimes known by the same name.

A double chopping knife should find its way into every well regulated kitchen. Upon the theory that time is money how much of it is wasted in chopping apples for the mincemeat, suet for the pudding or ham for sandwiches with a single bladed, old fashioned chopper that will do only half the work of a double one in the same time?

Stark Mad.

The principal life model for the horse of the statue of Washington in Boston was "Black Prince," belonging to T. Bigelow Lawrence, but the sculptor neglected no opportunity of studying everywhere the action of horses. Thomas Ball, the sculptor, says that on his way to the studio he passed a club stable on Tremont street. He made a practice of entering the stable to study the horse which the hostler happened to be rubbing down, and so refresh his memory for the day's work.

He did not think it necessary to explain his purpose, but silently walked about the horse and felt his muscles, without reflecting how his conduct must puzzle the groom. But finally he was told of a conversation in regard to him which passed between the knight of the currycomb and the proprietor of the stable.

Just as Mr. Ball was going out, one morning, the stable owner entered.

"Do ye know that gintleman?" asked Pat sympathetically.

"Oh, yes."

"Ah," said he, "poor fellow! He isn't right in his head."

"Why do you think so?"

"Well, he comes in here ivery morning, and no matter what hoss I have out, he walks 'round and 'round him, and looks him all over, and watches his huffs ivery step he takes, and he fales of him all over, and niver a word does he say. Yesterday, when I had ould Whitey out, I thought he niver would be done gazing at him. Thin I made bould to tell him we had better looking horses than that in the stable.

"'Yes,' I know,' says he, 'but they are not white, and I can't see the muscles so well.'

"Thin I made up me mind that a man that couldn't see a hoss that wasn't white without faling of him must be either blind or cracked, and he isn't blind!"—Youth's Companion.

Foreign Restaurants in New York.

The best foreign restaurants of New York—I mean run by foreigners and preserving the distinct characteristics of their respective nationalities—are presided over by practical cooks. Their proprietors are neither ashamed of their calling nor are they afraid of work. They go steaming about in shirtsleeves and white aprons and paper caps, carrying dishes, directing waiters, making change, inspecting the kitchen and the dining room and seeing that everybody is properly served and is satisfied. They manage the cooking themselves. They do their own buying. They look after their own wine cellars. In other words, they do just what an American wouldn't do and couldn't do.

Big, stout, well fed men they are as a rule, with a nose for red wine and a quick eye for any irregularity of service. Some of them have been long established, and their personality is stamped upon the place to the uttermost particular. It is remarkable—to a layman—how much individuality can be worked into a dish of kidneys or a plate of spaghetti or a bird or any other dish. It is still more remarkable how these myriad caterers to gastronomical New York can give so much and so well prepared for so little. I have been eating a meal here and there among these places about town for several years, as much as a matter of curiosity as of bodily gratification, and I never cease being surprised at the fertility of culinary resources displayed. I find nearly every place has some particular dish in the preparation of which it excels, and to which its habitues will invariably call your attention. A man may easily sample something new and in a different place in New York every meal of the year.—Cor. Pittsburg Dispatch.

How Horseflesh Tastes.

"You never ate horseflesh, I suppose?" said Lieutenant Russell, of the Seventh United States cavalry. "I have seen the time when I ate it with a genuine relish, and that, too, without any salt. It was in 1877, during General Miles' Nez Perces campaign. We had followed the renegades up the Missouri to its confluence with the Yellowstone, and the chase was so fast and exciting that we didn't realize how low our larder was getting until it was drained, and we were getting too far away from the base of supplies to replenish it. The game had all been driven out of the country ahead of us by the fleeing Indians, and when we finally caught up with the redskins and forced them to fight, we had almost nothing to eat for several days. We captured about 700 ponies from the Indians, some of them so round and sleek and fat as to appear to us the finest meat in the world.

"Our butchers killed the youngest and fattest of the ponies that night after the battle, and as soon as they were skinned and dressed we had a feast that would have made Lucullus turn green with envy. We lived on this pony meat several days. It was cooked without salt and roasted over a spit, like a barbecued beef. The meat had a peculiar, sweet taste, not at all palatable when I think of it now, and it was so fibrous that we could pull it apart in great strings. But it kept us from starving, and I therefore can heartily recommend pony meat to people in dire straits."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

A Trying Moment.

She was a nice little cousin from the country, and she had come to a city luncheon given by some swell friends. She was having a beautiful time and chatting away merrily, when the salad course came on, and the butler passed a small cream cheese. It was on a doily placed on a flat plate, and a silver knife lay by it.

The country cousin was busy talking, and without an instant's hesitation she took the plate, cheese and all, and set it down by her own salad plate. The butler gave a decorously repressed start of horror, the other guests began to talk very fast and the little cousin, suddenly appreciating what she had done, turned scarlet and sat and gazed at that cheese in dumb agony and wished she could die then and there.

But the hostess, who sat by her, said, gently putting the action to the word:

"Do let me cut you a piece of the cheese."

And then the plate was passed on, and everybody began to breathe once more. But the cousin didn't speak again for ten minutes.—New York Recorder.

Carrying Out a Friend's Wishes.

The money lender D, feeling his end draw nigh, adjured his three partners, A, B and C (whom he had made his heirs) to put $500 apiece into his coffin. "Though I can't take it all with me, at least let me have that much of it." They carried out his wishes to the letter, but, as it turned out on discussing the matter, in a slightly different way. A had put in a $500 bill. B, who was more sympathetic, and knew how his dear friend D loved bullion, had put in $500 in gold.

C was silent on the point, but on being pressed admitted that he had put in a check for $1,500 payable to D's order, and had taken the other $1,000 out.—San Francisco Argonaut.

PIE FOR SIXTEEN IN LONDON.

An American Traveler in a Place That Fascinated Dickens.

There is a pie shop in London that Charles Dickens used to stand before when as a child he drudged in a blacking factory. Every day, on his way to and from work, he paused to devour the viands with his eyes, and sometimes, as he said, he pressed his tongue to the window panes, as if by doing that he got a little bit of a taste of the good things that lay so near, yet were so far beyond his reach. An American railroad man who admires Dickens hunted up this pie shop when he was in London in order to gratify sentiment and curiosity. It proved to be a mere box of a place, in a poor quarter of the city, but the original business was still conducted there, and pastry of doubtful aspect and uncertain age still occupied the window. As the traveler peered into the shadowy interior a voice piped at his elbow, "Please, sir, will you buy me a weal pie?"

The owner of the voice was a small, disheveled person, with whom a veal pie or any other kind would have agreed right well, and he made his request from motives of undoubted and strenuous personal interest. The American replied, as Americans do sometimes, with another question:

"How many boys do you suppose that shop could hold?"

"I dunno. About fifteen or sixteen, I should think."

"Well, you go and get fifteen more boys and bring them back here."

The boy studied the man's face for a moment as if to make sure he was in the enjoyment of his senses, then hurled himself into a side street with a yell. Hardly a minute elapsed before he returned, the head of a procession of sixteen gamins, assorted as to size and clothing, unanimous in appetite and hope. This ragged battalion assembled close behind the benefactor, and followed him precipitately into the shop when he announced that he was going to give them all the pie they wanted.

For a quarter of an hour the astonished baker served "weal an' 'am" pies, hand over hand, to the sixteen astonished youth of London, while the American sat down and watched the scene with hardly less astonishment. Few words were spoken, and the onslaught was as fierce and persistent while it lasted as the charge at Tel-el-Kebir. The exhaustion of supplies brought the banquet to an end, and the traveler paid the score, thinking it little to pay, in view of the fun he had had, while the boys tumbled into the street, cheering feebly on account of their gorged condition, and went to spread the news of this miracle through the lanes of London.—New York Sun.

At the Truth Tellers' Club.

When I was in Maryland some years ago I stopped at an old fashioned inn up near Cumberland. You will perhaps recollect that in the summer of 1882 we had some horrible thunder storms. Have I ever told any of you this story before? No? Well, I put up at this inn one very sultry day in August, just as the sun was setting.

Shortly after we had retired a storm came up. The rain fell in torrents down the hillside, rushing like mountain lakes let loose, and then came the lightning and the thunder. At the first clap I sprang from my bed toward the window. The next flash revealed to me a grand old chestnut tree, rocked by the winds, dripping with the rain, and groaning and shrieking in terror of the storm. Then a crash.

When I came to they told me that the old chestnut had been struck, and that I had been stunned. I went down to see the old chestnut. Many of its charred limbs had been broken off and thrown to the ground. I made a startling discovery. It seems that in the old chestnut many birds had built their nests. The nests were all to be found scattered about in the grass. There were eggs in many of them. One of the nests was half filled with rain water, and in it were an English sparrow's three eggs. I picked up one of them and broke it. It had been boiled hard.

Near by I found another egg. It had been blown out of a nest, and in falling through the rain water had broken and the lightning had poached it. Not six inches away lay a mother bird, roasted to a turn, and in her mouth a bit of bread, toasted by the heat of the lightning. The next morning when I took my cold bath I found on my chest a perfect picture of the old chestnut tree, of the boiling eggs, of the poached egg and of the roast bird with the bit of bread, from which I could even make out the smoke and smell the bread toasting and the eggs cooking.—New York Evening Sun.

Medicinal Property of Clams.

I call to mind a remarkable instance of the efficacy of clams as a curative of internal disorders. A young woman well known in the theatrical profession some years ago came home to the metropolis to die, she having contracted gastric trouble while sojourning in the tropics. At the time of her arrival home in New York she was fearfully emaciated and could not even digest Liebig's extracts. All she could seem to assimilate at all was the juice she could suck from very rare broiled beef. To condense my story, her people were persuaded to let her have clam juice. It happened luckily that she was very fond of those bivalves, and through judicious nursing in time she recovered her health, and always attributed it, in great part, to the clams.—Philadelphia Ledger.

She—Oh, you will have when we are married!—Life.

"He teaches the truths of the Bible," said Dean Murray of a contemporary preacher, "as if each were the lash of a whip. They sting as they fall. Every manly instinct in his hearer rises in revolt against such savage hardness."

A Game for the Little Ones.

One of the prettiest little games for children is called the "wool ball." The children are seated around a perfectly smooth topped table. A little raw wool is formed into a light ball and placed in the center of the table. The children then commence to blow toward it, each one trying to drive it from him off the table, if possible, and the child who allows it to pass his right side and fall on the floor is excused from the table, and stands in a line by the wall. Each one who allows the ball to pass by and fall on the floor retires in line. The longer the ball is kept on the table, every one blowing as hard as possible, the more amusing the game becomes.

Where Chameleons are Plentiful.

Almost as frequent as tortoises in some parts of Cape Colony, and quite as popular as domestic pets, are chameleons. A schoolboy on a holiday ramble would not find much difficulty in picking a chameleon off a bush did he know where to search for it. "Oh, I'll get you plenty of chameleons," say my young friends to me, not far from Port Elizabeth. On flowering shrubs they are most frequently found and in gardens. In a garden in Cape Town I one day gathered four off a pomegranate bush.

Two were full grown and of a brilliant iridescent green with reddish markings; one was only half grown and had not full colors; the fourth was a tiny scrap like some stout legged insect, and was so exactly the color of the stem of the bush on which it was resting that only the inequality and unevenness of the spray attracted my notice at first when, looking closer, this mite was perceived. It did not change its tints rapidly and vividly like the others, but retained its pale, incongruous hue, excepting at night, when like the rest it turned "white," that is, extremely pale, the markings being then almost inconspicuous.—Cor. Forest and Stream.

A Bright American.

Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton is in London with her daughter, Mrs. Batch. In spite of her devotion to the welfare of humanity and the elevation of her sex this beautiful veteran American lady manages to get a great deal of fun out of the English and French people. She has been lecturing on grave and abstruse subjects all spring, and now that the hot weather has settled her fluffy hair and crisp ruching she is eating a lot of very good dinners, bathing a little, driving some and talking considerably with her old time brilliancy and vivacity.—London Letter.

How to Cool Melons.

If there is room in the ice box and plenty of time put the melons there. Otherwise wrap a wet towel around them and stand them in a draught to cool by the evaporation of the water on the cloth. To keep watermelons over night in a large tub of cold water is an excellent way to cool them. Do not lay ice upon the cut surface; it makes the fruit watery and destroys the substance.—Chicago News.

A woman who had been looking at a "To Rent" on Second street brought the key back yesterday noon and said:

"I like the house pretty well, but"——

"That is all right, madam," interrupted the owner. "You were going to speak about the need of repairing. I have just contracted to pay a firm $350 to paint everything."

"That will be nice. I was going to say"——

"Excuse me, but I shall have the wooden fence replaced with an iron one."

"Will you? And I"——

"And every room will be repapered in the most expensive manner, madam. I shall put stained glass into all the front windows, get new front doors, build a new barn in the rear, buy more land on each side and add five clothes closets."

"How nice! And you?"——

"I told you the rent was $40 per month, but I am satisfied that the figure was too high. I shall reduce it to $25, send my own teams to move you in, pay your water tax, cut the grass for you. You needn't mind about paying your rent in advance, but give it to me whenever you have no other use for it."

"You are very kind," she answered after a moment's thought, "but—you see—you know I promised to look at another house, and I'm a little particular, you know, and so I am much obliged."—Detroit Free Press.

WILL NOT LEAVE LOUISIANA.

What President Conrad Has to Say About the Big Lottery.

NEW ORLEANS, Aug. 26.—Bresident Paul Conrad, of the Louisiana Lottery Company, was interviewed to-day about the dispatch regarding the company's attempt to purchase a location in the Sandwich Islands. He said: "It is a 'fake' sensation pure and simple, or a malicious concoction, designed, perhaps, to prejudice the company in the minds of the people of the United States by creating the impression that our business is to be removed from the legal restrictions and accountability it is now under by virtue of the laws of Louisiana. Were the Louisiana State Lottery Company to become a Hawaiian instead of a Louisiana concern, of course it would be practically an impossibility to enforce claims against it; whereas, being a duly chartered corporation of this State, it is amenable to the laws. Obligations can be enforced through the courts against it the same as against any lawful and responsible company."

"But what are the company's plans for the future? Might not their negotiations be carried on without your knowledge?"

"Scarcely such vast sums as are talked of are not carried in one's vest pocket nor expended by one member of a concern without consulting his associates. The owners of the Louisiana Lottery are now scattered over the globe seeking peace or pleasure, according to their condition or taste. Mr. Morris, with friends, have been for weeks cruising about on his yacht, and I doubt if any one has communicated with him on business of any description. Certainly he is not giving himself any concern about lottery business, and I repeat there is simply nothing in this alleged San Francisco story except idle gossip, so far as I know, and I think I know all the facts. The Louisiana Lottery Company will live out its allotted time as fixed by its vested rights, say a couple of years longer, doing its business here as it always has, and abiding by the popular decision in the recent contest.—New York Times, Aug. 27th.

THE HERCULES.

In placing the Hercules Gas or Gasoline Engine in the field in competition with other gas engines, we do so with the utmost confidence that we are "in it." Our system of operating this engine is so far ahead of all others that it needs but an introduction in any community to insure an immense sale. A woman can handle it. It requires no engineer. It can be started in an instant. No electric spark to get out of order. It oils itself. It beats all others. Write Palmer & Rey, 405-407 Sansome St., San Francisco for particulars. The price and capability will surprise you.

For Simplicity it Beats the World. It has Fewer Parts, and is therefore less likely to get out of order than any other Gas Engine now built.

DEAFNESS CAN'T BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that we cannot cure by taking Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Let us hope that the people who habitually disregard their health will reach that desirable place, and avoid the locality which is less desirable as an eternal residence on account of the heat and surroundings generally. But while we tarry in this vale of tears, why should we voluntarily endure the tortures of dyspepsia when a systematic use of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters will rid us of the atrocious malady which—unless physicians are very much at fault—tends to shorten the term of our existence. Heartburn, biliousness, constipation almost always accompany this complaint and are symptomatic of it. These are all extinguished by the Bitters, which also conquers completely malaria, rheumatism, nervousness and debility, since the appearance of "la grippe" it has shown a singular mastery over this formidable complaint that has carried off so many of our brightest and best.

Once as I pondered o'er strange books, and sought
From secrets of the past a knowledge new,
Within my mind enthralled there sudden grew
The perfect germ of a stupendous thought:
No bizarre brain as yet had ever wrought
Th s odd, weird wonder into shape, and few
Could from the stores of fancy bring to view
A whim to equal this, to me untaught.
Its radiant advent thrilled one with delight;
But as I dreamed I heard a sad voice say:
"I, who am living in a spirit home
With the same thought that pleasures thee to-night,
Once charmed Tiberius on a festal day,
And made tumultuous laughter roar through Rome!" —Francis S. Saltus.

PARTLOW'S LUCK.

The buckboard and steady going ponies of Mr. Jackson Bitts, late of boomless New Chicago, rounded a bend in the timber road a moment after a man, mounted on a racking horse, entered it from a sideway which joined the main road a little beyond the bend.

The racking of the equestrian's steed was kept from becoming monotonous by a tendency upon the part of the racker to stumble at the slightest provocation, and his rider, as he weakly reversed the horse at the sound of the buckboard's approach and came racking toward it, looked as if a persistence in that mode of traveling might speedily result in shaking him to pieces.

He was thin and wan, as if from a recent illness, and his mouth had a discouraged droop at the corners.

He begged to share the buckboard seat with Mr. Bitts, supplementing the excuse that he was in danger of being unable to long keep his joints together if forced to continue the victim of the rack.

"A feller," he said presently, with a mournful tone that was almost a sigh—"a feller must save himself all he kin—'specially when luck's agin him."

He had fastened the racker behind the buckboard and crawled onto the seat with an "Um—ah!" of relief.

The two men exchanged the civilities of "passing the time o' day," and Mr. Bitts, having done all that courtesy demanded of him, was ready to resume the attack upon the chaotic schemes with which he had been wrestling before the appearance of the other.

"When luck's agin him," his passenger repeated sighfully, "as it is agin me!"

"I reckon so," agreed Mr. Bitts, encouraging but little the evident desire of the other to indulge in reminiscencing.

Mr. Jackson Bitts, late of New Chicago, was interested more in Junction City and the financial benefit he expected to derive from the place than in the woes of the man beside him.

He had approached New Chicago six months before with the same wrestling with schemes that now tore him.

The boom at that settlement had waxed and waned, and Mr. Bitts had failed to enrich himself; but with the ever springing hope that animates the true boomer, he was now on his way to Junction City, filled with still greater confidence than he had entertained upon approaching New Chicago.

It was decided and announced that the Dakota and Gulf railway would cross the Transcontinental railway at a certain point where there was not little of nature's handiwork to be seen.

The road bed of the Transcontinental, a shanty on the line between two homestead claims, an apology for a fence, another for a stable—that was about all there was to be seen.

This was at noon. A little later the agents of the two railroads and one of the proprietors of the shanty on the line between the claims were actively at work with a gang of men, and before 10 o'clock of the following day the entire section had been staked off in streets and lots.

At noon the sale of lots began, and before night many had been sold. By sunset half a dozen shanties had been "slapped up," and Junction City began to be.

The rapidity with which the news of the new born boom traveled was astonishing. The next day the building of houses and the coming of inhabitants began in good earnest.

Shanties sprang up. Others came on wheeled trucks from deserted claims and more or less excuseless settlements. Tents were plentiful. There appeared what out of courtesy were called stores. There, too, was a "hotel," the "accommodations" of which were little short of awful, and a saloon where was dispensed liquid comfort mostly of the "Battleax" brand.

A day later the initial number of The Junction City Pioneer was sprung upon the settlement by an enterprising gentleman who had previously founded The Sumner Pioneer and The New Paris Pioneer. There were also many other evidences of the daring and activity that a new born boom develops.

Bitts' passenger wriggled about on the seat of the buckboard and sighed again.

"Luck's be'n agin me ever since I kin remember," he ventured presently. "Name's Partlow—Oracle Partlow."

He paused to note the effect of this announcement.

Mr. Bitts uttered an "uh-huh" of assent, and withdrew within his shell.

"Yep," continued Mr. Partlow with pathetic pride, "I reckon I'm the unluckiest man 'twixt this an' anywhurs. I've b'en mighty nigh everything but plumb killed."

"That's bad," commented Mr. Bitts, without emotion.

"Um—ah! you bet!" pursued Mr. Partlow, warming up. "I've be'n shot by a deputy sher'f for a hawse thief. I've be'n blowed nearly out uv the county by a cyclone. I've stood on a bar'l with a rope around my neck, waitin' for a vigilantes committee to decide whether I was the feller they wanted or not, an' I was tarred an' feathered once by mistake. I've be'n held up by road agents an' robbed uv my last three dollars. I've be'n chased by a crazy man. My wife ran away with a man who owed me, an' who was reckoned by me to be sure pay. A well caved in on me once, an' kept me buried for forty hours with a half inch crack to breathe through. I've had the rheumatiz off an' on for ten years, an' the ager right smart uv the time. An', all things considered, I reckon luck's agin me!"

"Looks so!" agreed Mr. Bitts, mildly interested.

"Wal," resumed Partlow, "after I had drifted about all over the west, I finally struck this part uv the state an' settled down, a few miles south uv yere on a claim jinin' the one that Ike Blue took up next day. I 'lowed that out thar on the flat land, with little to steal an' apparently nobody to pester, I might sort o' live down my luck!"

He went on to tell how Mr. Blue and himself had erected their shanty across the dividing line of the two claims, each sleeping on the part of the cabin on his own homestead, thus making a cheap pretense of complying with the requirements of the homestead law demanding a place of residence on each claim.

Then, before they had got more than fairly settled, the Transcontinental railway put in an appearance, cutting their claims in twain, and remunerating their owners but scantily therefor.

No serious misfortune had overtaken Mr. Partlow, however, but his accustomed ill luck manifested itself often enough to keep him in mind of the fact that man is of few days and full of trouble.

The only cow possessed by the partners choked to death on almost the last of their turnips; the chinch bugs made merry with their discouraged looking wheat, and a train on the Transcontinental so frightened the team of horses that Blue and Partlow owned jointly that they ran away with a borrowed mowing machine and Mr. Partlow, ruining the former and endangering the life of the latter.

But all this was nothing more than he expected, he said sighfully, and it was therefore met with becoming resignation by Mr. Partlow. But Mr. Blue, less familiar with misfortune, began to look with suspicion upon his partner as a sort of modern and degenerate Jonah.

"Shouldn't wonder," commented Mr. Bitts.

It had been but lately that Partlow, though feeling physically out of shape, as he expressed it, had ridden to New Chicago on an errand of no interest to us, and while returning had become weak, ill and delirious and, as he learned afterward, had been found wandering aimlessly about at a considerable distance from the way he should have pursued, and faithfully followed by his old horse.

Partlow had been taken in and cared for by kind souls, and was now only just recovering from a severe illness.

He was ready to prognosticate more ill luck for the future.

Prompted by what he had believed a premonition, he had, before leaving the double claim, given Mr. Blue a laboriously executed document resembling a power of attorney, giving him authority over his claim during his absence.

And now it would not surprise him much, he confessed, to find that Blue, concluding that he had feloniously run away with the racking horse, had indulged in some retaliatory measure. He could not see how Blue could avoid entertaining an uncomplimentary opinion of him, at the very least.

"The claims air jest over beyond the timber thar," he continued; "an' I wouldn't be surprised if"——

His further forebodings were interrupted by the appearance of a little squad of horsemen, who came galloping toward them out of the timber, just ahead.

"That's Ike in front. The rest air strangers to me," he said, gloomily. "Wonder what's up?"

"Ike, what"— he began, as the horsemen reached the buckboard.

"Shut up!" broke in Mr. Blue. "We've got a surprise for you!"

Partlow doubled up a little closer on the seat of the buckboard. They were half way through the timber before he spoke again.

"Wonder what they're up to!" he muttered to Bitts. "Mebby they're goin' to hang me, or sump'n'! Say, Ike, I hain't done nuth'n' an'"——

"Shut up!" broke in the gentleman addressed.

"Jest my reg'lar luck," sighed Partlow. "But I hain't done nuth'n'!"

As they emerged from the timber he looked up to see the familiar outlines of the shanty, on the line between the two claims.

Instead he, wide eyed and open mouthed, beheld new born, bustling, booming Junction City, with its already respectable showing of houses and tents.

There appeared activity everywhere—men hurrying hither and thither, more shanties and tents springing up, a building just rolling in on trucks, a new depot rising skyward—in short, the springing up of a prairie "city."

"W'y—w'y—I—how—where"——

Mr. Partlow threatened to collapse.

"It's part uv the surprise," grinned Ike Blue. "You an' me own half uv the town. Mor'n a thousand dollars' worth uv lots sold already, an' more a-goin' all the time. Prices risin' every minute. We'll be rich men yet, Ork, ole feller!"

"I—my luck"——

"Has changed at last. I found out where you was very soon after you was taken sick, but as you wa'n't in any great danger I reckoned on not lettin' you know anything about this till I could spring it on you all at once."

"I—I can't believe it!" faltered Partlow. I"——

"Oh, it's all true!"

"Rich—luck changed—I can't believe my senses!" said Partlow, slowly. "I reckon I'm losin' my mind or sump'n'!"

He rose to step down from the buckboard, and weak from his recent illness and the excitement fell forward to the ground.

"His arm is broken in two places," was the verdict of the doctor who had arrived at the settlement in good time to be called to the cabin whither Partlow had been carried.

The sufferer uttered what sounded like a sigh of relief.

"Things air all right yet!" he said, weakly. "I hain't losin' my mind, after all. I'm still Oracle Partlow!"—Tom P. Morgan in Philadelphia Saturday Night.

That Day.

How terrible they are—some days that eat into the brain and stamp themselves on the memory for all mortal time! We can forget weeks of placid living, but never the pain that comes with one day of grief.

A poor little faded woman had been brought into court as witness in a disagreeable case involving very serious issues. The entire case depended on the fact that a paper had been signed on a certain day, and this the forlorn little woman was prepared to prove.

"You saw the paper signed?" asked the opposing counsel in cross examination.

"Yes, sir."

"You take your oath that it was the 30th of August?"

"I know it was, sir."

The lawyer, who thought another date could be proved, assumed an exasperating smile and repeated her words.

"You know it was! And now be so good as to tell us just how you know it."

The poor little creature looked from one countenance to another with wide, sorrowful eyes, as if she sought understanding and sympathy. Then her gaze rested on the face of the kindly judge.

"I know," she said, as if speaking to him alone, "because that was the day the baby died."—Youth's Companion.

Substitute for Beef Tea.

Dr. Ris, of Kloten, emphatically recommends pea soup as a most serviceable substitute for beef tea in the case of invalids, convalescents, and more especially for patients suffering from cancer of the stomach, or diabetes mellitus. The method he advises is: Take peas, water and a sufficient amount of some soup vegetables, add ½ per cent. of carbonate of soda, boiling the whole until the peas are completely disintegrated, the soup to stand until sedimentation is complete, and finally decant the fairly clear, thin fluid above the deposit. The product is stated to resemble a good meat soup in its taste, to be at least equally digestible, and at the same time to surpass the very best meat soup in nutritve value. In regard to the latter claim Dr. Ris states in explanation that peas as well as beans or lentils, either of which may be used instead of peas, contain a considerable proportion of legumen, that is, a vegetable albumen, easily soluble in a faintly alkaline water, not coagulated by heat, readily absorbed, and equal to the a'bumen of egg in nutritiousness.—Exchange.

A Woman's Lovely Manner.

The value of a beautiful manner is a topic of never ending charm, just as the beautiful manner itself is in life. A lovely character expresses itself in no more delightful way. One who is always thoughtful of others in a self forgetting way, who has kindness and calm, has invariably a charm of manner which is helpful and inspiring to all who see it. A lady came to Boston on an important errand a while ago. She had three men to see for signatures in a matter of artistic importance. She gave herself two days to see them, but she went about her business with so much of quiet directness that, although they were strangers whom she must see, the matter was attended to, she was ready to leave Boston and found herself with time upon her hands, all within twenty-four hours. "That woman ought to achieve what she tries to do," said one of the men whose signature was put to the valuable paper. "She did not stay in my office three minutes, yet she didn't fuss or hurry. She has a lovely calm."—Boston Transcript.

Paste for Scrap Books.

Take equal parts of gum arabic and gum tragacanth and dissolve with enough warm water so that it will be like thick gloss starch. If on trial you find the paste too thick to spread nicely with a small brush, thin with more warm water, stirring until it is smooth again. A small amount of gum makes a lot of paste. Keep in a large mouthed bottle that can be covered tightly and it will keep for months; yes, a year or more.

If it dries down hard or thick soak it up with more warm water. A bottle of this stuff is very handy during fruit season for pasting labels on fruit cans or jars.

In making scrap books the slips of paper or pictures should be arranged on the page before commencing to paste any, as they will stick so quickly and so tightly that it is not easy to make changes.

A little experience with this paste will soon give you a scrap book that will look much prettier than the ones carrying the marks of flour paste all through the leaves. —Hall's Journal of Health.

Novelties in Perfumes.

To the making of scents there is no end. Mr. Piesse, of the Bond street laboratory, told me that he introduces about four new scents every year. White lilac and crab apple blossom are in season just now. But the use of scent, owing to the introduction of sprays and the like, increased every year. A curious novelty is a piece of flannel or thin leather saturated with an odor called Peau d'Espagne. It is sewed into a woman's dress and lasts for a long time. In fact it is almost permanent. Or a small piece of it will scent a garment. The scent is also used in soap.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Teach the Children to Save.

Teach the children to give away from their own pennies, and not come to papa's pocket every Sunday morning. True generosity can easily begin then. Stimulate them to save by offering to double every dollar earned if it goes in the bank or for some approved purpose. A child enjoys the freedom of ever so small an amount, and adding the knowledge that he has really earned it makes him feel a hundred fold more manly than he whose wishes are gratified before they are spoken.—Good Housekeeping.

A Parlor Sprinkler.

A novel little arrangement in the way of a watering pot for home use is just out. In the place of the usual spout a rubber tube is attached to the can and provided with a glass mouthpiece. By pressing the hand upon the rubber tube the plants can be watered in such a way that not more than the necessary quantity can escape; besides this, no water is liable to be spilled. After watering the plants the glass mouthpiece is placed back in the can.—Exchange.

Half a teaspoonful of sugar will nearly always revive a dying fire, and, unlike the few drops of coal oil which servants are so fond of using and which have caused so many sad accidents, is perfectly safe.

Sour milk should be removed from a tin vessel as soon as possible, as it is never well to permit an acid to remain in a metal receiver. For this reason many people object to canning fruits in tins.

DO YOU REMEMBER.

Do you remember when the leaves were fading,
Dropping like the golden rain
(Your azure eyes knew naught of sorrow's shading, Nor any tinge of pain)?
We walked beneath the trees; the moon was shining
'Mid fleecy clouds above,
Just showing us their inner, silver lining;
Do you remember, love?

Do you remember when the birds were calling
Sadly from naked boughs,
And softly, silently the turf was falling
On furrows made by plows;
And when the plumage of the angels whitened
Both field and river shore,
I felt your fingers round my own were tightened
As if to part no more?

And just to think the year is not yet vanished,
And we are far apart,
Like two lost souls from Love's sweet Eden banished,
Sent forth with pierced heart!
Perhaps the past is scarcely worth regretting,
And Lethe comes to all;
Perhaps there is a pleasure in forgetting
Scenes past beyond recall.

And should it come to this, will you remember,
When autumn comes apace,
And leaves are falling through a drear November
Like tears on Nature's face,
The good old, tender days when earth seemed resting
Beneath your sunny smile,
In quiet peacefulness its joy attesting,
And sorrows slept awhile?

Yet should the future bring to you repining,
A craving for the past,
Remember always clouds have silver lining,
And even love may last;
That from the tossing seas the ships come sailing
Laden with precious freight,
All careless of the winter wind's loud wailing—
"Not lost, but only late."

Miss Bashkirtseff's Tomb.

Marie's body lies in the chapel built by her mother in the cemetery of Passy, just outside of Paris. The chapel is a work of art, designed by Bastien Lepage's brother and made of marble. In building this memorial chapel Mme. Bashkirtseff disregarded cost entirely, so much so in fact that it went beyond even her means, and still remains to be paid for. Around Marie's grave are hung all her best pictures, those of some of her girl friends still alive, which must be rather gloomy, and the picture which Bastien Lepage painted when he tried unsuccessfully to win the Prix de Rome as a young man, for which Mme. Basakirtseff paid an immense price after the artist's death. She thought, as she told Marie's friends, that it would please Marie to have the painting in which Bastien was so much interested hanging up near her body. The building of such a chapel as Marie's in the cemetery of Passy was contrary to the municipal regulations. It was through the influence of the Marechal de Canrobert, who is also a senator, that Mme. Bashkirtseff got special permission from the Paris municipal council.—New York Sun.

A Happy and Favored Spider.

Far up in the corner of my room is a big black cobweb, and a big black spider dwells therein. He has dwelt there quite a year now, and although many surreptitious feminine glances of horror at the wretched housekeeping of some people steal up to that corner my happy spider is never disturbed. I think he almost loves me now; he comes down often, dropping inch by inch, by a thin golden thread, and he runs rapidly and twinkling-legged over my table and papers, pausing for moments at a time to look at me with bright, unwinking eyes and motionless body.

Happy, happy fellow! He has his health, his spirits, and his home with a tiny sweetheart locked therein, where no covetous eyes may find her. What more could he ask to make him happy? But one day—ah, me!—some one else will come into this room with an alert eye for cobwebs and a strong hand to remove them, and then—then—when he is homeless and friendless and hopeless my spider may understand how right down good I was to him.—Ella Higginson in West Shore.

A Question of the Conservation of Energy.

A correspondent writes: "It is a well known law that energy is indestructible, but a case came to my notice a short time ago in which it is hard to tell in what form the energy appears. A metal spring is placed under tension, and while in this state is fastened and placed in acid until it is completely dissolved. What becomes of the energy stored up in the spring? Is it turned into heat, and, if so, how?"—New Orleans Picayune.

Ingratitude of Republics.

For presuming to issue a military emancipation proclamation, and thus break the back of slavery and rebellion with one blow, Gen. Fremont was suppressed. The country that finally adopted his policy after an untold loss of blood and treasure neglected to accord him either credit or reward until it was well nigh too late. It is an impressive instance of the ingratitude of republics.—Boston Globe.

A Boy's Prayer.

Smart children's saying are rather overdone, but there was a good deal of diplomacy about a little fellow who prayed long and earnestly for a double ripper. Finally his mother told him that perhaps God didn't think best for him to have a double ripper, and his next prayer was formed a little differently, "O Lord, please send me two sleds and a board."—Springfield Homestead.

Boiling Eggs by Prayer.

One of the oddest uses of the Nicene creed is that which it is applied to by the women of ancient Nicæa, where the creed was in great part originally formulated. They recite it after putting eggs in a pot to boil as a measure of the time needed to cook them. It is said that they do this without any idea of irreverence.—Churchman.

Clear Proof.

Proud Father—Taken high degrees in your scientific course? Proud of you, my boy. By the way, can you prove that heat expands and cold contracts?

College Graduate—Certainly. Don't the days grow longer in warm weather and shorter in winter?—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Prayer Unanswered.

A missionary had taken his wife with him to India. There she died, and the brokenhearted widower received permission from the missionary board of his church to come home. Here he promptly consoled himself, and with his second spouse returned to the field of his former labor. But fate was still unkind and at the end of a year he was once more bereaved. Again he besought the permission of the board to return home, but this time they gently but firmly declined, saying that they did not feel justified in the expense of giving him two vacations within two years. They suggested, delicately, however, that if his desire was to recoup himself for his recent loss it was possible for him to deputize a friend to secure for him a new partner of his joys and sorrows. This he accordingly did.

The day the steamer was signaled the bridegroom elect went down to meet it, accompanied by a married friend. When the latter returned he was pounced upon by his own wife, who demanded all the particulars of the meeting. "Did Dr. Smith seem much overcome when he saw Miss Brown?" was the first question. "Well—yes—a little." "Wasn't he overjoyed?" "Well—overjoyed is not just the word, perhaps." "Why, didn't he say he was delighted?" "Well—no—not exactly." "But, at least, he seemed pleased?" "Well—I don't quite know."

"For mercy's sake, tell me just what he did say and do." "Well"—with evident reluctance. "When he saw her she was at the other end of the deck and she was pointed out to him by the friend she had traveled with. Smith looked at her for a minute, and then he passed his hand over his eyes and I heard him murmur, 'Red hair—for the third time—and after so much prayer!'"—Pittsburg Dispatch.

His Rebuke.

Much of the music sung in city churches would scarcely be characterized as "sacred" if it were heard anywhere except in the house of God. And there are some odd people who even in this age of progress consider that such music belongs rather to the concert room than to the church.

Parson Snow was one of these people, and when he "exchanged" one Sunday with an old college friend who was settled over a large city parish he was both amazed and shocked by the vocal display—the anthem—with which the members of the choir electrified the congregation.

"They had fine voices, my dear," he explained to his little wife when he was safely back in his own home, "and I presume they wanted to show them off, and so took advantage of a time when their pastor was away. I thought at first of rising and requesting them to desist. Then I felt that perhaps it would be my duty to report the matter to Doctor Green.

"But I finally concluded that, as it was undoubtedly a first offense and caused by an almost pardonable vanity, I would deal gently with them. So I waited until they had finished, and then I rose and said, 'We will now begin the religious services of the morning.'

"And I feel sure," concluded the simple minded pastor, "that they felt my rebuke and will not let such a thing occur again!"—Youth's Companion.

The "First Edition" Craze.

Is this hankering after first editions but a mere craze or fashion?—in which case I would venture to predict that when the book loving and book buying public once begins to consider seriously what it is that really constitutes the value of any first edition the ridiculous and artificially enhanced prices of such issues will fall.

Upon this public weakness, whether fostered by sentimental or any other feeling, the booksellers are now trading and are in the habit of calling attention in Roman capitals in their catalogues to first editions of almost every conceivable book—of course at the same time adding a correspondingly increased price to books which are hardly worth purchasing in any edition.

For the present great demand for first editions the keen competition among English speaking peoples from abroad for any book of special value now offered for sale may be in a great degree responsible, aided by a large class of unreasoning beings who buy books merely because they are first editions, and who by dint of their long purses are able to "rush in where angels fear to tread." These are they upon whom ordinary book lovers look with dread, and the booksellers not always with approval.—Notes and Queries.

A Bit of Correspondence.

A remarkable correspondence has been published, ending in a true Irish fashion. It begins: "Mr. Thompson presents his compliments to Mr. Simpson, and begs to request that he will keep his doggs from trespassing on his grounds."

"Mr. Simpson presents his compliments to Mr. Thompson, and begs to suggest that in future he should not spell 'dogs' with two gees."

"Mr. Thompson's respects to Mr. Simpson, and will feel obliged if he will add the letter 'e' to the last word in the note just received, so as to represent Mr. Simpson and lady."

"Mr. Simpson returns Mr. Thompson's note unopened, the impertinence it contains being only equaled by its vulgarity."—London Tit-Bits.

Ventilation by Windows.

It is always proper to resort to window ventilation if no other means of ventilation is attainable. Lower the windows from the top; if possible open one window from the bottom, but choose a window the opening of which will not create a draft. Heated air rises and will escape through the lowered windows, while the fresh air will enter through the raised windows.—New York Sun.

Professional Pride.

"Why do you children wear such dreadfully long hair?"

"How are folks to know that our father is an artist?"—Ulk.

A COSMOPOLITAN SCHOOL.

A Queer Mixture of Children in One of New York's Big School Buildings.

Until about a year ago the principal of ward school No. 23, New York, did not realize what a queer lot of pupils he had, although he had sometimes laughed over the strange collection of names upon the rolls. A year ago he took a census and carefully traced out the exact part of the earth from which the parents of each of his pupils had come. He found that there were in his school no less than twenty-seven different nationalities, speaking about twenty-five languages other than English and its dialects. He found that of these sixteen were in the primary department alone.

So not long afterward he arranged a novel feature to one of the school entertainments. At a certain place in the programme each child arose, holding in his or her hands two flags. One was the American flag, the other the flag of the nation from which the father had come. The visitors to the school were astonished. They recognized half a dozen flags well known as the banners of European nations—Italian, German, Spanish, French, Swiss and the like. Then they saw nearly a dozen others, recognizable from their shapes and colors and designs as the banners of barbaric or semibarbaric countries, known to us in a vague way as heathen.

When these children, none being under five years of age, first come to this school they are foreigners to the very core. They speak the language of their fathers, and perhaps have never even heard the sound of an English word. They are of the country from which their parents came both in customs and ideas. Their clothing alone bears the stamp of America, and that so out of accord with their faces and expressions that they seem ill at ease, and even more poorly clad than they really are. They enter the primary department. And here it may be said that, although the youngest are five years old, the ages of many extend upward toward eighteen and twenty years.

It is the business of Miss Rose O'Neill and her seven assistants to teach these children the English language, and then to make American children out of them. Go into the school at the beginning of the school year, and you will think the task hopeless, impossible. Come back at the end of six months, and if you close your eyes and listen to the reading exercises you will not be able to distinguish Chinese child or Arab child or Tunisian child from the few pure blooded Americans who form the curiosities of the school. Then you will wonder how the miracle has been performed.—Harper's Weekly.

Educate Children to High Ideals.

We are too ready to impart instruction to children from low moods and on a low plane, because we do not ourselves habitually dwell in the latitude of the uplands. Motives of policy, of vanity, of seeming instead of being right, enter into our own lives and, alas! poison the lives of the little ones at the fountain. A grand life, a brave example, a splendid instance of fortitude, of self abnegation, of courage against odds is never in vain. It is an object lesson that flames out from the sky, as the planet amid the host of lesser stars. Whether it be an arctic or an African explorer, the leader of a forlorn hope, the missionary living among the island lepers, or the army nurse, leaving home and luxury to minister to the wounded and soothe the dying, the noble ideal is uplifted before the eyes of those who are yet in the initial stages, and whose characters are not yet in the mold of destiny.

This thought of the lofty ideal gives the chief value of our annual Decoration Day, giving us pause amid the pomp and ease of peace, that we may think not of the pageantry of war, but of its sufferings, its fever and thirst, its rigors of cold and furnace heats, its weary marches, fierce battles and the patriotism which alone condones its bitter woe and the mourning that follows in its track.—Harper's Bazar.

Powerful Indian Air Guns.

The Indians along the Mirida river hunt with blow guns made out of the young stalks of a certain kind of palm, from which the pith is removed. The arrows employed as projectiles are simply splinters of reed, sharpened at one end, the other end being wrapped with enough silk cotton obtained from another kind of palm to fill up the bore of the blow gun. The arrows are about ten inches long and very light. They are tipped with the famous and deadly "woorari" poison.

Used by one of these naked savages the blow gun is a weapon of great accuracy and effectiveness, even a small bird on a treetop being brought down by the skilled shooter with reasonable certainty at the first try.—Interview in Washington Star.

A Curious Salvage Case.

Perhaps the most curious salvage case on record is that of the ship Two Friends, which stranded on the coast of Cuba and was abandoned by her crew. Another ship, the John Blake, met a similar fate, and her crew, in attempting to find a landing place, came across the Two Friends, which they managed to get off and to navigate to England without further mishap. The judge who tried the case decided that salvage services had been rendered, but of only ordinary difficulty and merit, inasmuch as the crew of the John Blake salved the Two Friends in order to save their own lives. The owners of the John Blake of course got nothing, but the salving crew received £350 out of the total value of £1,237.—New Orleans Picayune.

The Art of Conversation.

"Conversation," says a brilliant American humorist, "is, in this generation, a lost art."

It was an art which our grandfathers studied perhaps more than any other. A gentleman, in the beginning of this century, was usually more ambitious to tell a story well or to state his argument clearly than to understand science or statecraft.—Youth's Companion.

Old But Good.

It was at a clinic at the university. A patient was brought in who imagined she was a victim of consumption.

"Will you please tell the gentlemen what troubles you, madam?" said the professor.

"Oh, doctor, my right lung is all gone." This in a weak plaintive whisper that could scarcely be heard a dozen feet away, then brightening up, and in a full strong voice that could be heard all over the room: "But my left lung's all right!"

Great applause from the students.—Philadelphia Press.

A Natural Inquiry.

"Are you the girl who was to come to our house as a nurse?" asked a fashionable lady of the healthy looking girl who had just entered the room.

"I am, ma'am."

"I have examined your references, and I find them satisfactory. You may begin next week."

"But if ye plaze, ma'am, I'd like to ask yez wan question."

"What is it?"

"Is it a baby or a poog dog that I'm to look afther?"—Merchant Traveler.

Only One of Its Kind.

Indiana, among other distinct features, is the proud possessor of the only successful skunk ranch in the world. If there are any other skunk ranches now on a paying basis I have not yet visited them. The domestication of this little rhododendron has so far been left to Mr. Joseph Lininger, near Huntington. He has a ranch there of this kind, and goes into society very little indeed, I am told. Few go to see him, and his groceries are handed over the fence to him by means of a fishing pole.

Skunks are most prized for their fur and also their oil. The oil is not used on salad, as many suppose, but as a remedy for croup. Skunk's oil is worth ten cents an ounce, and the contest between a tablespoonful of it and a case of croup is said to be entirely one sided. Mr Lininger began with fourteen of these animals. He now has several hundred of them, and can buy any of the adjoining farms at his own price.

Last summer he used to go to church at Huntington every Sunday morning, but this year the church is paying him $5 a week to pray in secret.

The skunk is said to possess strong affection for the human being, but in most instances it is not returned. The skunk resembles the elephant in one respect, viz., because he cannot climb a tree.

Mr. Lininger says this little animal does not require much food, and even that little is of the very plainest kind. And yet he is an offal eater after all.

The sac which supplies the little heliotrope with his all pervading scentiments may be easily removed, says Mr. Lininger, and then the animal is as harmless and even more devoted than the common house cat. Possibly that may lead to the general adoption of this animal as a house pet some day, and along with the stingless bulldog our houses will be filled with delight. Then the New York landlord who cannot let us have a house if we are injudicious enough to be parents and publicly admit it can let his high stoop brown stone front to a poodle dog infirmary or a skunk aquarium, and thank heaven that he is not encouraging American children in our great metropolis.—Bill Nye in New York World.

The Man with a Big Head.

Senator Sawyer tells a good story on himself. There was a man up in the Oshkosh country of the name of Hutchinson, who was a great boaster. If he cut one log of wood he would be sure to report a hundred, and if he saw a dozen blackbirds sitting on a stump they would be a thousand before he told about them in the nearest saloon. One season he did some logging for Mr. Sawyer, and for his pay received a check on the Northwestern National bank for $120, payable to his order. Mr Hutchinson had never had such an experience before, and he showed the check to his friends with a great deal of pride before he took it to the bank to get it cashed. When he did so the teller, of course, made him write his name on the back of the paper, and that was an incident of still greater importance in Mr Hutchinson's life. Then he went to his home in the woods, and said to everybody whom he met on the way:

"Old Sawyer can brag as much as he's a mind to about his money, but the bank made me indorse his check before they would cash it for him."—Washington Cor. New York Tribune.

He Thought It Was Mean.

In a home on Commonwealth avenue, not many evenings since, the father, unwonted to such duties, thought it incumbent upon him at a certain period during the evening's exercises to take his youngest son upstairs for a short outing, based upon the child's disobedience to its mother. The echoes from the interview penetrated to the parlor, and while there was great sympathy for the afflicted heir-apparent, a laugh could not well be restrained when, in the midst of the "boo-hoos," was heard the shrill, treble voice: "Pa, I think it's real mean for you to spank me. Why don't you let mamma do her own work?"—Boston Record.

A Timely Table.

A Canadian crank wants to annex the New England states, and has introduced a proposal to that effect in the Dominion parliament. The "annexation" will resemble the capture of a prisoner told of in war literature, somewhat as follows:

Soldier—I've caught a prisoner.
Officer—Bring him along, then.
Soldier—He won't come.
Officer—Then come yourself.
Soldier—He won't let me.—San Francisco Post.

Getting It Down Fine.

Marguerite, a blue eyed cherub of 5 years, knows how she wants the gas turned when she is ready for sleep. After she had said her prayers a few nights age, and as her mother was preparing to lower the gas jet, she said: "Mamma, turn it to just a pimple," and then closed her eyes to sleep and dream of "Pigs in Clover."—Buffalo Courier.

To Be Treated with Respect.

"You greet that lady with great deference, Maud. Who is she?" "She? Why, she is Mrs. Foolscap. She is literary." "What has she written?" "Oh, she has just had a story rejected by the Atlantic."—Boston Commonwealth.

INYO INDEPENDENT.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 24..... 1892

Newspaper statesmen continue to insist that the high tariff on wool should be maintained. Here in Inyo county, where great numbers of sheep are pastured, the sheep owners say that the traiff on wool is an injury to them and they would like to have it changed. This is the difference between theory and practical knowledge.

Isn't it time for some public acknowledgement of the services rendered in the campaign by Mr. Estee? Poor Morris! He was a fine looking bird when he started out. A gobbler with all his feathers spread was not in it compared to him. Now he is in a worse plight than a draggled old crow. We would move a vote of thanks, but maybe he wouldn't appreciate it from this side of the house.

Long ago the observance of Sunday as a day of rest for the whole people was abandoned in Germany. The very close study of all matter of scientific interest in Germany has convinced the leading thinkers and observers that the failure keep this day of rest has seriously impaired the national vigor, and earnest efforts are being made to recover the lost Sabbath in the interest of the working people.

If the Democratic party in Congress will hasten to stop the vast swarms of ignorant and vicious people who are crowding into the country from southern and eastern Europe, they will afford the best kind of "protection for American labor." These hordes are encouraged to come here by the tariff robbers, and as fast as they land American citizens are turned out of employment to make room for them. In this way wages are reduced, and the wealth of Carnegie and others is added to.

On the proposition to elect United States Senators by direct vote of the people instead of by Legislatures the vote was very largely in the affirmative. The present method is one of the most prolific sources of corruption in Legislatures. A man who has become rich by any means but has not a single qualification for the office, can buy a seat in the Senate. In Pennsylvania Matt Quay by his ill gotten millions became a Senator. Samuel J. Randall gave a life time and great ability to public service, but he could not become a Senator; and after all service died so poor that there was hardly enough money to pay funeral expenses.

The acquisition of great wealth has always been followed by a desire for titles and class privileges and distinctions. American girls hunting over all Europe for titled husbands, and the parents of the girls aiding them in the chase, show clearly enough that the same craving for titles and artificial distinctions exist among our own upstart rich. So strong is this craving that all delicacy and even common decency are forgotten in the desire to gratify it. Not long ago an American girl, the only heir to great wealth, was married to a titled German; that he was a shameless blackguard did not seem to be any objection. One of the conditions demanded by the man in return for making the girl share his title was that a part of her wealth should at once be used to pension a woman who was then his mistress. The condition was granted, the pension is regularly paid, and the other woman is a "princess". The tariff laws we have had since the close of the war have put enormous wealth into the hands of vulgar minded people, and such examples as the above are the result. It need not be doubted that many of those who have become millionaires in recent years would be quite willing to have an Emperor or King in the United States and themselves and their wives and daughters flaunting their splendors in a court. And a nice lot of courtiers they would be, the Prince of Petroleum, the Duke of Anthracite, Marquis Pine-Log, Lord Bacon and Count Coupling-pin. But it is clear that the great body of the American people are now taking thought of these matters, and that a check will be put upon the system that would take all the profits of labor to enrich a few and leave the toilers in hopeless misery, while the rich would destroy every vestige of freedom as they have done in all the nations that ever existed. But we have now only called, "Halt!" We must face about and march double quick in the path of reform.

CHARLEY'S PRECIOUS HAIR.

Heartless Deception of a Trusting Maid by a Bald Young Man.

He had the air of a man of the world. His dress was becoming and not too showy. He seemed to be an individual who had dined well, who would tell good stories at the club.

Stretched out in the barber's chair in the hairdresser's room on School street, instead of settling down with that indifferent, self satisfied air that usually comes over a man in that situation, he seemed troubled. He looked about from chair to chair, and yet he was not happy. The barber shaved him and was so impressed that he even forgot to talk him to death. Then the man sat bolt upright in the chair and took an envelope from his pocket. It was scented; the barber could tell that. It was written in a lady's hand too.

The strange man opened it, took out a note, read it over and over again, then from its folds withdrew a lock of hair. It was golden, and the victims who were waiting for their turn in the chair saw him kiss the sunny lock and put it back in the envelope.

"Hair cut?" asked the barber, as he rubbed the tufts of hair which surrounded a bald spot on the strange man's head.

"No, no, not for the world," he replied, "I cannot spare any."

"Man in next chair has hair like yours, only a little more of it," suggested the barber.

"By Jove, he has," said the troubled man, and he darted out of his seat and almost jumped to the occupant of the next chair.

"Going to have a hair cut?" asked the strange man.

"No," was the rather curt reply.

"Well, will you have a hair cut at my expense?" said the man without hesitation. "I must send my best girl a lock of hair, and I can't spare mine. Come, how much is it worth?" and the eyes of the colored boy who brushes coats bulged out beyond his forehead.

"Sell it for a small bottle!" replied the man with a good growth on his head, and the stranger answered, "I'll go you."

The barber began his work, and a lock of the man's hair was handed over to the stranger, who put it in a little silver locket that bore a monogram. Then, when the work was finished the two walked out together.

The stranger was smiling contentedly, the clubman grinned, the barber laughed and the customers gazed on in astonishment.

"Wasn't Charley a dear, good fellow to keep his promise and send me a lock of his hair?" said the pretty girl that night as she took the daintiest sort of a lock from the little box. And all was still but for the beating of her faithful heart.—Boston Herald.

Feelings of a Monkey.

A native of India was sitting in his garden when a loud chattering announced the arrival of a large party of monkeys, which forthwith proceeded to make a meal off his fruits. Fearing the loss of his entire crop, he fetched his fowling piece, and, to frighten them away, fired it off, as he thought, over the heads of the chattering crew. They all fled away, but, he noticed, left behind upon a bough, what looked like one fallen asleep, with its head resting upon its arms.

As it did not move, he sent a servant up the tree, who found that it was dead, having been shot through the heart. He had it fetched down and buried beneath the tree, and on the morrow he saw sitting upon the little mound the mate of the dead monkey. It remained there for several days bewailing its loss. —Robert Morley in Nature Notes.

The Romans Did Not Use Soap.

The Romans were not acquainted with the use of regular soap, but they employed an alkali, with which the greasy dirt was dissolved out of their clothes. This alkali, called nitrum, is referred to by Pliny, but the cheapest solvent was urine, which was mostly used. The clothes were put in this, mixed with water and then stamped upon with the feet. This process was performed by old people, while boys lifted the clothes out of the tubs. The white garments, after being washed, were subjected to the vapor of sulphur, being stretched on a frame and the sulphur burned beneath. Poor people in Rome cleansed their bodies with meal of lupins, called lomentum, which, with common meal, is still used in some places for that purpose.—Knowledge.

Early Printing and Illustrating.

The first printing press in the United States began its civilizing work at Cambridge, Mass., in Harvard university in 1639. The first American made illustration, it is still believed, is in Tully's Almanac, of Boston, in 1698. The first American copper plate portrait published in this country was in Increase Mather's "Ichabod," published in 1703. The first three engravers were Paul Revere, Benjamin Franklin and Isaiah Thomas, who distinguished himself at the battle of Lexington.—New York Sun.

Why Some Babies Cry.

A great many babies cry out of pure cussedness. They have no reason whatever. I have seen them stop playing to begin to howl, refusing both food and drink. Often a child will wake up, begin crying, and fall off to sleep again. Babies show individuality, and cry just as adults grumble, scold, lecture, bang things about and swear. There may or may not be cause for the outburst, but there is a certain amount of relief which has a physiological if not a moral value. —Cor. Baby.

Irish and Germans Eat Potatoes.

Ireland leads the world with a potato eating capacity of 1,320 pounds for each man, woman and child, while Americans eat but 150 pounds per head annually. The Germans are great eaters of the vegetable, their consumption being over 1,000 pounds per head each year.—Good Housekeeping.

Some Famous Echoes.

There is a famous echo on the Rhine between Coblentz and Bingen, which repeats a word seventeen times, while in the sepulcher of Metella, the wife of Sulla, in the Roman campagna there is an echo which repeats five times in different keys, and will also give back with distinctness a hexameter line which requires two and a half seconds to utter. Brewster mentions an echo on the north side of Shipley church, in Sussex, England, which repeats twenty-one syllables. —Brooklyn Eagle.

How Witches Were Convicted.

One of the theories of the age was that the devil set his mark upon each of his servants—that witches were all marked. A jury of the sex of the accused was appointed to examine the body for such marks. It often happened that some excrescence of flesh common to old people, or one explainable by natural causes, was found. One such was found on the body of Goody Nurse and reported to the court, all but one of the jury agreeing to the report. Rebecca Preston and Mary Tarbell knew that the mark was from natural causes. The prisoner stated to the court that the dissenting woman of the jury of examination was one of the most ancient, skillful and prudent, and further declared, "I there rendered a sufficient known reason of the moving cause thereof." She asked for the appointment of another jury to inquire into the case and examine the marks found on her person.

The jury of trials returned a verdict of not guilty. Thereupon all the accusers in court "cried out" with renewed vigor and were taken in the most violent fits, rolling and tumbling about, creating a scene of the wildest confusion. The judges told the jurymen that they had not carefully considered one expression of the prisoner, namely, that when one Hobbs, a confessing witch, was brought in as evidence against her she said: "What, do you bring her? She is one of us." The jury retired for further consultation. Even then they could not agree upon a verdict of guilty. They returned to the courtroom and desired that the accused explain the remark. She made no response, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty.—New England Magazine.

Barbarian Bee Communities.

The so called queen bee is really the mother of the hive. Her functions are maternal rather than regal. If she may be said to reign in a certain sense, the workers rule, deciding all questions and performing all acts affecting the common weal. Populous and powerful bee communities sometimes relapse into barbarism, renounce the life of peaceful industry for which they have become proverbial, acquire predatory habits and roam about the country as freebooters, plundering the smaller and weaker hives and subsisting on the spoils.

These brigand bees seldom reform; if they busily "improve each shining hour" it is not to "gather honey all the day from every opening flower," but to range the fields in looting parties and ransack the homes of honest honey makers. Against these marauders of a plan society and other foes the honey bees often fortify their hives, barricading the entrance by a thick wall, with bastions, casemates and deep, narrow gateways. When there seems to be no immediate danger of hostile attack these defensive works, which seriously interfere with the ordinary industrial life of the hive, are removed and not rebuilt until there is fresh occasion for alarm. —Atlantic Monthly.

A Departure in Telephony.

The manager of the telephone exchange in Lisbon achieved distinction some time since by connecting the royal palace with the opera house at a time when the king was in mourning. The telephone man also connected his own house with the transmitters on the stage of the opera, and had wires with receivers attached all around his drawing room. On opera nights he used to invite his friends to enjoy the performance at his house, and it was a curious sight when some ten or twelve people were sitting about the room in comfortable armchairs with receivers to their ears—head telephones were used, so that there was no necessity of holding up one's hands all the time—and listening attentively without uttering a sound beyond an occasional exclamation of delight or surprise.—Electricity.

Songs Not Easy.

Beranger, the famous French poet, whose greatest gift lay in writing little poems which he called songs, was particularly dependent upon the chance visits of the muse.

He was once visited by the author and academician, Viennet, who said to him:

"You must have written several songs since I saw you last."

"I have only begun one," answered Beranger.

"Only one! I am astonished!" exclaimed Viennet.

Beranger became indignant.

"Humph!" he shouted. "Do you think one can turn off a song as one turns off a tragedy?"—Youth's Companion.

Use of the Telephone in Surgery.

A remarkable application has been made by Dr. J. Mount Bleyer. In a case of membranous croup intubation was successfully resorted to. When the removal of the tube became necessary it had disappeared. Tracheotomy would evidently have to be performed, but the difficulty was to locate the tube. A delicate metallic probe attached to an electric wire, the other end of which terminated in a telephone receiver, was passed down through the larynx. As soon as it came in contact with the tube a distinct click was communicated to the ear through the receiver. The exact location having thus been determined, tracheotomy was performed and the tube extracted.—New York Telegram.

English Oaks.

The old "Parliamentary Oak," in Clipstone park, England, is believed to be 1,500 years old. The tallest oak in that country, called the "Duke's Walking Stick," is higher than the spire of Westminster abbey, and the largest is the "Cowthorpie," which now measures seventy-eight feet in circumference, and at one time with its branches covered more than an acre of space.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Chinese Built Bridges in 65.

From an early date the Chinese seem to have constructed suspension bridges of considerable magnitude, one in the province of Junnan, constructed in the year 65 A. D., being the most celebrated. —New York Journal.

A Modern Curriculum.

Visitor—I understand that the public schools of this city are models of Nineteenth century progress?

Little Boy—Yes'm, that's wot every one says. I go to 'em.

"What do you study?"

"Oh, everything—free 'and drawin, an cookin, an bacteriology, an music, an spectrum analysis, an sewin on buttons, an agricultural chemistry, an dishwashin, an everything."—Good News.

A Paris Telephone Company.

In Paris the idea of entertainments by telephone has been so far developed that a company has been formed to provide a theater telephone service. Instruments are placed in clubs, hotels, cafes and restaurants, and various performances are constantly on tap. By dropping a half franc into a slot the vicarious theater goer obtains communication with his favorite playhouse for five minutes, and if he times his connection properly he can hear the song which has become the hit of the season at a very small charge. A private service of a similar nature is also contemplated, and before long it will be quite natural for a host to give a theater party in his own drawing room.

There is always a peculiar fascination for the general public in listening by means of the telephone to entertainments which are given at a distance. One of the most attractive features of electrical exhibitions is always the telephone section, where a number of telephones provide entertainments "on tap" from theaters and concert halls. This was particularly noticeable at the Paris electrical exhibition held some years ago, and at the Lenox lyceum in New York. The telephone section was crowded all the evening with delighted listeners.—Electricity.

The Struggle for Bread in Vienna.

The distribution of bread to the poor of Vienna took place Tuesday between 11 o'clock and noon, in order to make sure that only the unemployed received alms. Though 6,200 large loaves, which had cost 1,200 florins, or £100, were given out, several hundred starving people had to go away empty handed. The scenes witnessed were perhaps the worst that have occurred as yet. It was pitiable in the extreme to see wretchedly clad women, with babies in arms, and children, fighting as for their lives for a loaf of bread, into which, hot as it was from the bakery, they cut like hungry wolves.

Similar scenes were witnessed at the distribution of bread to men. About twenty people fainted in the crush, and those who saw the bitter disappointment of the many who, after waiting for hours, finally received nothing, will never forget the spectacle of human misery and want. Four thousand two hundred loaves were given away yesterday, when the crush was so enormous that a number of poor women, with babies in their arms, and several old men fainted away and required medical attendance.—Vienna Cor. London Standard.

A Big Ferry on Lake Michigan.

A marine experiment of great importance to Milwaukee is announced. The Toledo, Ann Arbor and Northern Michigan railroad is about to build a large ferry steamer to test the feasibility of carrying trains of cars across Lake Michigan from Kewaunee to Frankfort. The new steamer will cost a quarter of a million of dollars, and will be large enough to carry forty freight cars, and she is to be fast enough to make the runs across the lake between the points named in about five hours. The distance is sixty miles.

The ferrying of cars in this manner will result in a great saving, as it costs from six to twelve dollars a car to make the transfer of freight from the cars to the steamers, and besides, the loss through breakage incident to such transfers will be prevented. It is thought the experiment will prove successful, as freight trains have been thus transferred for years between Cape Charles City and Newport News, a distance of forty miles, across the mouth of Chesapeake bay, where the water is sometimes very turbulent.—Milwaukee Wisconsin.

The Sanyasis of India.

Popular belief in India still credits Sanyasis and other holy vagabonds with miraculous powers. Even the native journals often chronicle marvels like the instantaneous cure of incurable diseases, or the feeding of thousands out of a small measure of rice. One of these prints gives a description of how a saintly Sanyasi saved the lives of a certain rajah and his escort from a wild elephant. As the party was proceeding through the Lower Himalayas a monstrous tusker broke out of the jungle and set to trumpeting. The rajah and his followers were considerably scared, and were giving themselves up for lost when a noble looking Sanyasis appeared, and, standing in front of the travelers, told them to shout a certain order to the elephant. This done, the animal bolted into the jungle, while the savior of the rajah and his party vanished without waiting to be thanked.—Philadelphia Ledger.

P. Clinten came in from Cerro Gordo yesterday.

Charley Summers of Bishop was in town yesterday.

Gustave Sanger of Alvord was in town a few days during the week.

Marius Jullien and wife were up from Lone Pine on Wednesday.

C. Meysan of Lone Pine was in town on Wednesday, accompanied by his daughter, Mrs. Blanche Jullien.

J. J. Gunn arrived from the Minnietta last Sunday evening. He is in poor health and is receiving medical treatment.

Five years ago L. Wood planted a few small walnut trees at Independence. This year they have produced their first crop of nuts. They bore well.

An old fashioned new England Thanksgiving dinner was given at Big Pine by the ladies of that place for the benefit of their pastor, C. L. Logan.

B. Way came up from Lone Pine last Monday on his way home to Bishop. He had been employed at the latter place on the foundation of the new school house.

O. I. Mairs and wife arrived home on Wednesday from San Francisco, coming by way of Mojave. Mrs. Mairs had been gone several months visiting in different parts of the State.

J. W. Lacey has leased his farm at Camp Independence and moved with his family to Lone Pine. He has leased a butcher shop at Lone Pine and will go into that business.

Al. Goodman, nephew of Mrs. A. W. Eibeshutz arrived from San Francisco on last Friday's train. He is in poor health and hopes to be benefitted by Inyo's glorious climate.

On Tuesday last Manuel Leon was tried by a jury in the Justice Court at Independence and found guilty of the crime of petty larceny. He was sentenced to a fine of $300 or 150 days in the county jail.

The cases of J. J. Morton and C. Hedges charged with different offences, were both tried in the Superior Court last week before juries. Both defendants were pronounced not guilty. Mack and Laird were attorneys for defendants in both cases.

From Independence boxes of roses, violets, crysanthemums and other flowers are being sent to friends in eastern states. As snow storms bitter cold and all the signs of winter now prevail where the flowers are sent they will be a nice object lesson on climate.

W. Crapo is reported to have struck a promising body of silver-lead ore in his mine at Cerro Gordo. The ore was reached but a few days ago, and the extent of the body is not yet known. Mr. Crapo has worked a long time to reach this ore and deserves that his faith and patience should be richly rewarded.

J. W. Clark, late Reciever of the U. S. Land Office at Independence left here yesterday for Bishop. During their stay at Independence Mr. Clark and his family won the respect of every body here, and it is generally regretted that the income of the office is so small that he decided to resign.

A. W. D. Carrol of Lone Pine was in town a few days during the week. Mr. Carrol is a member of the Sierra Club at San Francasco, and is taking many photographic views of the mountains with a view to illustrating articles to be published by the club.

A. H. Danker died recently at his home at Los Angeles. In the flush times at Havilah, Kern County, Mr. Danker kept a hotel there. When the mines failed he went to Los Angeles and went into the hotel business. He afterward bought land near the city. The property he left is now worth $500,000. His widow and five children inherit it.

An Old Timer Heard From.

A few days ago Mr. W. L. Hunter had a letter from Mr. J. W. Symmes, who is now living at Redlands engaged in Orange culture. Mr. Symmes still owns his old home place near Independence. The letter says, "There must be a little stir about the lower end of Owens Valley, if not about the entire Valley. Two or three weeks ago a man came up from Pomona to ask me questions about the land. As near as I could make out from his description the particular track he inquired about is that near Cottonwood creek. He had forgotten the names of the two streams but the description he gave tallied with the country on the west side of the Lake. I could not give him much information except that there is quite a tract of country between Cottonwood and Olancha creeks that is good for alfalfa, fruit trees and grapes. The gentleman said that he and others are trying to form a syndicate to bring water upon the land from, as I suppose, Cottonwood Creek, and then sell the land out in small tracts, the same as is done here in Southern California. He said that there was then a party on the way up there who had written back from Mojave complaining of a very hard trip so far, and that they had yet four days of hard travel ahead of them. I judge that they are tenderfeet, for they thought it a hard trip from Los Angeles to Mojave. I fear they may get sick of their journey before they get through, and may be so disgusted that the country will not look good to them after they get there. He told me of some one who had been up there not long since and had made arrangements with Mr. Dodge of Lone Pine to show parties over this land. This gentleman said apples had been brought from my orchard and from other orchards that made quite a stir among the people about Pomona. About ten days ago a real estate agent here in Redlands who found that I had lived a a long time in Inyo county came and talked with me a couple of hours. He asked questions about the Valley from end to end and from side to side. I told him and the man from Pomona that if I were a young man again with the health I had thirty years ago I would not give Owens Valley for a poor man to live in and make a raise, for all I had yet seen in Southern California; and that if there were a broad guage railroad from Mojave to Bishop, I would not give an orchard of winter apples in Inyo county for an orange orchard in Southern California acre for acre. The expense of continuous cultivation in an orange orchard, plowing and cultivating after each irrigation to make the land retain moisture which must be done every 15 to 20 days from May 1st to December 1st is great. Fertilizers must be put upon the land from year to year or no marketable crop can be produced. All these items of expense take off more of the profit than the owners of orange orchards care to have published. I do not say that apple, pear, prune or peach orchards in Owens Valley would not be benefited by fertilizers, but I do know that I never put fertilizers on my orchard and that so far as I could see my orchard bore as good fruit the 13th year as it did the first year it produced. * * * Redlands is still growing slowly, not making the rapid growth it did the first year I was here. * * Seedling oranges will be only a small crop, but budded trees are well filled. Apricots were nearly a failure, but peaches were a heavy crop and brought what was called an extra price at the end of the drying season, selling for $30 per ton in the orchard. Grapes, I believe, are a good fair crop."

Hay For Sale.

Hay will be sold on the farm of the undersigned at $6 per ton; delivered at Independence, $7 per ton.

Thanks are due Mr. and Mrs. Frank K. Andrews for wedding cake received last week. The gentleman is in business in Bishop and is favorably known throughout the county. The bride, formerly Miss Jessie Parsons of Round Valley is well known here, and many join us in wishing the young couple all happiness.

In this issue will be found an advertisement for a grand inaugural ball to be given for the benefit of the Independence Brass Band on Friday evening, Dec. 30. The committee on arrangements are diligently working to make this a grand affair. A large number of people are expected to be present from all parts of the county.

A contract has been let to O. Hampton and son of Bishop for moving the Pavilion from where it now stands to a location on Market street opposite the present residence of Sheriff Gorman. By an arrangement recently made with the Fair Directors the Pavilion became the property of the Reine estate and will be put upon ground belonging thereto. The work of moving will begin next week.

Attention of correspondents is again directed to the fact that all articles for publication must reach this office not later than Wednesday of each week. All articles containing local news of general interest will be inserted, and we cordially invite correspondents to forward such communications. But no articles of special nature, dissertations upon politics, religion etc., nor poetry will be published unless paid for in the advertising columns and over the writers' signature.

DEMAND THE DIFFERENCE.

In buying baking powders, as well as anything else, insist upon having the worth of your money. If another brand is urged upon you in place of the Royal, bear in mind that it has from 27 to 50 per cent. less leavening strength than the Royal, as shown by the official chemical tests, which is equal to from 13½ to 25 cents per pound less value than the Royal. If you buy a low class powder, see that you are charged a correspondingly lower price.

The Czar's New Yacht.

The emperor of Russia is building a new yacht, which will be more than twice the size of the Osborne. She is intended to be a vessel of great speed, and all the latest improvements will be introduced, including the electric light. The saloons and cabins will be marvels of comfort and luxury, and there is to be dining accommodation for 200 persons. The yacht will be used by the emperor for cruising in the Gulf of Finland and in the Baltic and for his annual visit to Denmark, as his majesty has conceived a horror of railways since the accident in which the imperial family so narrowly escaped destruction. This yacht, which is named the Pole Star, is 325 feet long and 46 feet in depth. She is fitted with twin screws, and is so built that she can easily be converted into a cruiser in case of war. The first service of the Pole Star will be to convey the czarovitch and his brother, the Grand Duke George, to India, China and Japan.—London World.

In a Big City.

Curious contrasts frequently appear in the newspapers. There was a case in point a few days ago which showed how it is possible for people in this big city to starve while not very far away food is being thrown away because the market is hopelessly glutted. A column of the newspaper in question was given up to the description of the superabundance of bluefish and the necessity of getting rid of thousands of fish for which there was no demand. In the next column was a long story of attempts at murder by strikers who were homeless and hungry. Had they been able to refresh themselves on the extra bluefish their attempts might have been successful. As it was they did not do a great deal of damage and the fish went to waste.—New York Times.

A Coachman's Footgear.

It lately happened that on an accident occurring to the equipage of a rich merchant, the coachman, though apparently faultlessly dressed, could not be induced to leave the box. At last, when he jumped down, the whole crowd burst into laughter, for he wore a pair of tattered slippers and blue woollen stockings.—Berlin Cor. Chicago Inter Ocean

Lighthouses are classified by orders depending on the height and diameter of the lighting apparatus. There are four orders. The first three are used for sea or coast lights and the fourth for harbor purposes.

MERCURIAL RHEUMATISM

Mr. J. C. Jones, of Fulton, Ark., says: "About ten years ago I contracted a severe case of blood poison. Leading physicians prescribed medicine after medicine, which I took without any relief. I also tried mercurial and potash remedies, with unsuccessful results, but which brought on an attack of mercurial rheumatism that made my life one of agony. After suffering four years I gave up all remedies and commenced using S. S. S. After taking several bottles, I was entirely cured and able to resume work. S.S.S. is the greatest medicine for blood poisoning to-day on the market."

"I am ready to testify under oath that if it had not been for August Flower I should have died before this. Eight years ago I was taken sick, and suffered as no one but a dyspeptic can. August Flower cured me. There is no medicine equal to it." LORENZO F. SLEEPER, Appleton, Maine.

Four Heroes of a Mine Accident.

A horror was averted at Monmouth, Ills., by the prompt and vigorous action of four brave men. The tile works, a mile east of the city, was the scene. An explosion of gas at the foot of the new shaft, ninety feet deep, ignited the engine house at the top, and the wooden structures about were soon ablaze. The shaft was soon filled with smoke, and the sixteen men imprisoned below were obliged to seek shelter in the furthermost recesses of the mine, where they lay down in their faces to keep from suffocating. There seemed no means of escape, and the cries of the mothers, wives and daughters were heartrending.

Four brave men volunteered to go to their comrades' rescue, and were let down an old disused shaft. Armed with pickaxes and spades they dug an entrance through a six foot wall of earth, and one by one the nearly suffocated men crawled through the small passageway, over the burning debris, and were hoisted up. When the last one was rescued a shout of joy went up from the many hundreds who were gathered at the spot. Some of the men were more dead than alive when rescued, but all will recover.—Cor. Chicago Inter-Ocean.

Robbed a Theatre Treasury.

At a certain town in Hungary the other day, in broad daylight, the treasury of the theatre was broken into. Not a kreuzer was found in the money chest, but there happened to be a large number of unsold tickets for a certain night, which the thieves, either from chagrin or with an eye to business, appropriated. The angry manager, it is stated, was mollified when he discovered that the thieves had found nothing more valuable than the tickets. It is many a day since a full house has been seen in the theatre, and should the thieves realize anything from their booty he anticipates at all events being cheered with the sight of the crowded seats.—London News.

Sport on the Restigouche.

The more the Restigouche is fished the greater appears to be the number of fish. Dr. Rainsford, a rector of St. George's, New York, has killed sixty-seven salmon since the season opened, each averaging in weight over twenty-three pounds. Another gentleman killed twenty in one week. It is the best fishing this season that has been offered for the past ten years, and all who take part in it are very much pleased with their luck.—St. John (N. B.) Gazette.

Standing on Etiquette.

Mrs. Smilk—Are you going to your friend Mrs. Blank's funeral to-morrow?

Mrs. Nubbs—Certainly not. She owed me a call.—Chicago Herald.

Love's Young Dream.

Miss De Sweet—Do you like pearls?

Mr. Nicefellow—I do not care for separate pearls; they are too tame, but I admire them in rows or clusters.

Miss De S.—So do I. If there is anything I love, it is a pearl necklace—large pearls, you know. Pa gave me one some years ago, but although it is very handsome, I do not care much for it, because the pearls are rather small.

Mr. N.—Oh! Small pearls should never be put into a necklace. Only the largest size are worthy of such display. For my part, I much prefer diamond necklaces.

Miss De S.—Aren't they lovely! The pure white diamonds especially.

Mr. N.—Yes. It's a pity, though, the colored diamonds are out of fashion, but I think they are coming back. I saw a necklace today with every tenth diamond colored, and the effect was wonderfully brilliant. It was at Biffany's; quite cheap, too. By the way, will you marry me?

Miss De S.—Oh! This is so sudden! Yes, my love, I will.

Miss De Sweet (half an hour later)—Clara Nubbins, next door, is engaged, too, but I think her lover showed shocking taste in the selection of her ring, it is so big and clumsy; and, besides, it seems sort of brazen. It is six large diamonds set with pearls.

Mr. Nicefellow—For an engagement ring there is nothing neater than plain gold. Biffany has them for a dollar.—New York Weekly.

Not Very Encouraging.

Algy had spent a long evening with Miss Edith. At last he rose to go. Her handshake was not cordial enough to suit him; in fact, it was very limp and exhausted. He was disappointed, for he had expected a very different parting, but in a vein of pleasantry he said, "Oh, shake hands with a man, Miss Edith!"

"I should be pleased to, Mr. Brown," was her quiet rejoinder. Algy has not called since.—Harvard Lampoon.

A Bran Packer.

A novel invention is a bran packer for the use of millers who do a large export business and to whom economy of space is desirable. The apparatus consists of an augur working in the funnel that fills the bag. It constantly revolves, at the same time having an up and down motion. On the down stroke it forces the bran into the sack, packing it solidly at the same time.

A WILD GOOSE PATROL.

Herders Defending Wheat Fields from Flocks of Geese and Ducks.

"It may sound funny to people in the east to be told that to protect the grain crops in some of the California counties from wild ducks and geese the farmers have to employ a large force of what are known as herders to patrol the fields and shoot, club and destroy and frighten away by various means the enormous flocks of these ravenous fowl that sweep down on the young and growing grain and devour it, but such is the fact," said James E. Palen, a large grower of wheat in the Sacramento valley. "The ravaging swarms of ducks and geese begin their work of destruction early in the fall, as soon as the wheat begins to sprout. The fowl invade the country along the rivers, but they do not tarry there an hour after the rains have made the wheat plains habitable for them.

"I have seen a tract of seventy-five acres in Colusa county absolutely covered with wild geese, so densely packed as to resemble pictures I have seen of seabird rookeries on some ocean rock. When they first come they wax fat on the wheat stubble, and are juicy and sweet flavored for the table, but when the young winter wheat appears they work on the green sprouts. This has the effect of making their flesh rank, and no one in any of the wild goose ridden districts will eat of these fowls then. They are shipped by the thousand, all the same, to San Francisco and other markets all winter long, where the people seem to think the green wheat fed birds are a delicacy. But if the markets could take ten times as many as they do the number would be small compared with the thousands and thousands of the destructive fowls that are killed and left lying on the ground.

"Tolo county, where I live, especially in its northern part, I once thought could beat all creation as a feeding place for wild geese, for I have seen these flocks so thick in the air, going to and from their favorite pasture, that only few-and-far-between glimpses of the sky could be obtained for an hour at a time. But when I went into Colusa county I made up my mind that I had never seen wild geese enough before to speak of. There is a large expanse of barren plain in that county which affords an unrivaled place of rendezvous for both geese and ducks, and I have seen those barrens when I thought that all the wild geese that went forth to all parts of the land, near and remote, must surely have their starting place on the Colusa county barrens. They may be seen rising up from the plains in swarms like the locusts of Egypt, and going forth in all directions to prey on the farmers. They remain all winter long, and the wheat the farmers cut in the harvest they have had to fight the geese and ducks for months to retain.

"There are many large wheat ranches in these two counties, such as the Glenn ranch, the Bogg and others. From twelve to twenty-five herders are employed by each of the big ranches to patrol the wheat fields and wage continual warfare against the geese and ducks. These herders live in cabins scattered about the ranches, and tramp about the fields from daylight until dark, and long after night, too, if the moon is shining, for both geese and ducks feed on the wheat fields at night if it is moonlight. Ducks are more troublesome than geese at night, and it was discovered accidentally a few years ago that a light in a field would frighten them away. Lanterns were placed in large numbers among the wheat, and for a long time the fowl were so shy of the bright lights that the farmers were benefited. At last, however, the ducks became used to the lanterns, and grew so bold as to feed by their light.

"The small farmers in the wheat district, being unable to individually employ herders, have combined in a sort of mutual herding association, and pay for patrol protection out of a common fund, many of the farmers doing herding duty themselves."—New York Sun.

A Brave Little Yankee.

During the revolution a party of Connecticut troops were captured on Long Island, one of whom was a fifer boy much undersized, though full of fire and very strong for his inches. His commanding officer being summoned to the presence of the British general, the boy followed. "Who are you?" said the general. The boy replied, "I am one of King Hancock's men." "Can you fight?" asked the general. "Yes, sir; I can," said the boy.

The general called up one of his own fifers and said, "Dare you fight him?" "Yes, sir," answered the little Yankee. The general then told the fifer to strip and give battle, which he did forthwith. The fight ended in victory for the small son of Connecticut. Indeed, the little Briton was so badly damaged that it was deemed best to interfere, lest the Yankee boy should demolish him entirely.

The English officer rewarded the little fellow's valor and resolution by giving him his liberty, and he lost no time in making his way to the land of steady habits, where his exploit was duly chronicled in the local newspaper.—Youth's Companion

Married After Twenty-three Years.

Twenty-three years ago Mr. Joseph Hamilton and Miss Virginia Hickman, both of Bath county, were engaged to be married, but they had a lovers' quarrel, and Mr. Hamilton left for California, where he settled in San Diego county. By hard work he became a prosperous man. About a month ago he returned to his old home near Millborough Springs, and in forty-eight hours after his arrival married Miss Hickman, who had remained faithful to her first and only love. The bride is a first cousin of the celebrated Bishop William Taylor, a native of Rockbridge, and for many years past bishop of Africa. Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton will spend the next few weeks visiting relatives, and in September will leave for their California home.—Staunton (Va.) Vindicator.

Failed to Keep His Appointment.

In one of the frontier settlements in the wild west a German cobbler was elected police justice. His reputation as an honest toiler was well established, but his legal knowledge and sense of humor were so far of unknown quantities.

One of his first cases was that of a tough citizen who was duly arraigned for a breach of the peace. The justice heard the evidence in the case and pronounced sentence of three months in jail. This so enraged the defendant that he ended a vigorous abuse of the court by promising to call on him promptly that day three months and prepare him for a first class funeral. The judge heard this abuse silently, and then, without any emotion, cogitated as follows:

"Vell you kills me today three months ago, vill you? Let me see. This is August first. Three months vill be November first. Thanksgiving vill be twenty-fifth. I vill miss my Thanksgiving dinner. Christmas is next. I vill miss Christmas too. Six months from August first vill be Shanuary. I makes it six months, und den you kills me, vill it? You shust go right avay to jail six months, and then I see you any more I shoust shoot you so full of lead it vill take von steam derrick to lift you down to your grave. You hear me?"

The six months were up long ago, and the justice still sits upon his cobbler's bench when not dispensing justice from his official seat. The tough citizen is presumably herding cattle.—New York Press.

Music as a Medicine.

The soothing and beneficial influence of music upon the mind has been recognized from time immemorial, and now an instance is related in Popular Science News where it appears to have exercised a directly medicinal effect upon the physical frame. An English gentleman tells a story of his son, aged 6 years, moribund with typhoid—quite insensible, abdomen tympanitic, pulse failing, and said by his physicians "not to last the night out." Carbolic acid was given with some good effect, while the doctor staid up all night at the bedside; but the coma continued. Finally the father, knowing that the boy was intensely fond of music, procured a nice, large music box.

He asked his son if he would like to hear it play. No response and no sign of recognition. The music box was set agoing. It was not long before his countenance changed and his body became uneasy. After a while he turned over on to his side. The box was put behind his back. After another tune he turned over to it, and became conscious so as to respond to questions. "Now, see here," said Mr. Thompson, "this is for your own use, and shall be called Willie's music box." The boy showed signs of pleasure and wished it kept playing. The result was reaction continued; he responded to treatment and recovered. Certainly, music was a medicine in this case.

A Wedding in Egypt.

On the principal street we heard music in the distance, and coming nearer found that a wedding was in progress.

A matting was spread upon the ground, upon which the bride, a rather old and rather cross looking Nubian girl, sat. Her veil was the usual shawl, this time of white. Also upon the matting sat the musicians, two drummers playing upon a single instrument, a peculiarly long drum. A woman sat at one end of it, a man at the other, both beating together, using alternately the palm of the hand and a drumstick.

To this music a number of women in gay dresses were dancing, two at a time, taking turns in flourishing over the head of the seated bride a pole some six feet long. We stopped in the encircling crowd to see what was going on, and had stood there but two or three moments when one of the women who had been dancing suddenly threw herself headlong upon the matting, closed her eyes and seemed to go off in a kind of fit.

The other woman ran to her, fussed over her a little, and then drew back to await developments. Petitioning our dragoman to find out what this all meant, he said she had been drinking too much of the native wine, and he interpreted the woman whom he questioned about it as saying that she "have de debbil in her." In a few moments she came out of the first unconscious condition and began wildly to clutch about her. The umbrella belonging to one of our party being conveniently near she seized upon it, and only with the dragoman's help was it torn away. We passed on, satisfied to assist no more in the festivities.—Cor. New York Commercial Advertiser.

Settling a Dispute.

An Italian who keeps a fruit stand on the corner of Court and Schermerhorn streets became engaged in a wrangle with a small boy who tried to get three apples for five cents. A policeman off duty stepped up to the stand, saying, "What is the matter, Italy?" The boy fled while the Italian was explaining the cause of the difficulty. The policeman helped himself to two juicy pears from a lot labelled five cents each, and munched one of them, putting the other in his pocket. He sagely told the Italian to be careful in his dealings with boys, and it was a question whether the fruit vender was as angry at the decamping boy as at the policeman whose coat tail was weighed down by the pear he had deposited there.—Brooklyn Eagle.

A Students' Introduction.

A theological student who was accompanied by his professor to a country place where the former was to preach prevailed on the professor to make the opening prayer. Arising to make the announcement, he amazed the congregation by saying: "Professor Smith will now lead us in a petition of the faculty of the H—— seminary to the throne of grace of which I have the honor to be a student. After accompanying him your humble servant will attempt to preach the word whose shoes he is not worthy to unloose."

Whether the audience got his statements in reference to his professor and his order of service sufficiently separated to comprehend the situation is not told.—Youth's Companion.

THE HERCULES.

In placing the Hercules Gas or Gasoline Engine in the field in competition with other gas engines, we do so with the utmost confidence that we are "in it." Our system of operating this engine is so far ahead of all others that it needs but an introduction in any community to insure an immense sale. A woman can handle it. It requires no engineer. It can be started in an instant. No electric spark to get out of order. It oils itself. It beats all others. Write Palmer & Rey, 405 407 Sansome St., San Francisco for particulars. The price and capability will surprise you.

For Simplicity it Beats the World. It has Fewer Parts, and is therefore less likely to get out of order than any other Gas Engine now built.

Daily Newspaper and Job Office.

We have used your four horse-power "Hercules" Gas Engine for nearly two months now, and have not yet failed to get our edition off on time; on the contrary, we find it the best investment we could have made. For convenience it cannot be beat. Unlike the steam engine it is clean, no coal to shovel into a furnace, no fires to get up, no water to watch to keep the boiler from going through the roof—indeed it is simple and economical in all respects, and we feel that in changing from steam to gas we have secured a donation of $100 per year to the office, independent of all other considerations, and that means that $100 is the difference in the cost of fuel per year between steam-power and gas power. Thanking you for past favors, including the great service done by you in putting an engine like the "Hercules" on the market, we are,

Yours truly, PENNYCOOK & HARRIER,
VALLEJO CAL., Jan. 14, 1892, Proprs. Chronicle.

A Leading San Jose Printer Says.

The two horse-power "Hercules" Engine bought last December, more than fulfils every promise you made for it. Am running two jobbers and a Cottrell Cylinder with it, and I am satisfied it would run as much more machinery with ease. I have not had the least trouble with it, and I can cheerfully recommend your engine to any one desiring a reliable and economical power. Have had considerable experience with other makes of gas engines, and do not hesitate to say that the "Hercules" beats them all. The hollow "tube" is a great improvement over the unreliable "spark," and what especially pleases me is that your engine developes more power than you claim for it—something that cannot be said of any other make of gas engine coming under my notice. I never bought a piece of machinery that has given me the satisfaction your engine has.

Printers Pleased With It.

We beg leave to report to you on the success of one of your "Hercules" Gas Engines which is now in operation in our office. It is a one horse-power, and readily runs a large power press, and a jobber at the same time, and is then not working up to its full capacity. We have had no trouble whatever with the engine, and for neatness, convenience and power we consider it the best in the field. We are delighted with it, and with the experience had with it, and can heartily recommend the "Hercules" Engine to anyone. Truly yours,

ON THE WAY TO PARADISE.

Let us hope that the people who habitually disregard their health will reach that desirable place, and avoid the locality which is less desirable as an eternal residence on account of the heat and surroundings generally. But while we tarry in this vale of tears, why should we voluntarily endure the tortures of dyspepsia when a systematic use of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters will rid us of the atrocious malady which—unless physicians are very much at fault—tends to shorten the term of our existence. Heartburn, biliousness, constipation almost always accompany this complaint and are symptomatic of it. These are all extinguished by the Bitters, which also conquers completely malaria, rheumatism, nervousness and debility. Since the appearance of "la grippe" it has shown a singular mastery over this formidable complaint that has carried off so many of our brightest and best.

DEAFNESS CAN'T BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that we cannot cure by taking Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

STOOD THE TEST.

ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS are unapproachable in curative properties, rapidity and safety of action, and are the only reliable plasters ever produced. They have successfully stood the test of over thirty years' use by the public; their virtues have never been equalled by the unscrupulous imitators who have sought to trade upon the reputation of ALLCOCK'S by making plasters with holes in them, and claiming them to be "just as good as ALLCOCK'S," and they stand to-day indorsed by not only the highest medical authorities, but by millions of grateful patients who have proved their efficacy as a household remedy.

Beware of imitations, and do not be deceived by misrepresentation. Ask for ALLCOCK'S, and let no solicitation or explanation induce you to accept a substitute.

BEFORE THE BAL MASQUE.

And so you have found an old programme.
Throw it away, my dear;
In its silken sheath it has lain there hid,
In that old box with the sandal wood lid,
This many and many a year.

Let us look! A galop with George Bellair.
Bless you, he's tamer now;
A decorous deacon, and leads at prayer,
And, just to look at him, one would swear
To dance he never knew how.

And Robert! Ah, little that night I dreamed
That his wife I should be;
I was only a child, and the future beamed,
Golden glamored and golden gleamed,
But a foolish child, you see.

That line's illegible—pass it over
To this, then—Philip Keene;
A loyal lover, a reckless rover,
Poor boy, beneath the western clover,
His sleep is sweet, I ween.

And this quadrille was with Devere
We used to vote so slow,
Strange and silent and rather queer,
But the critics trumpet his praise this year,
For his books are the rage, you know.

Can we read the last waltz, faint and blurred?
Quick! Quick! Take it away!
Charlie! Yes, he went at my word.
And at Alexandria—so I have heard—
He died—a hero, they say.

Hark! thrust it deep in the fire—again!
Hear that tread in the hall!
Ah, Robert! a touch of the same old pain,
Nothing more—'twill not remain—
I'm ready, dear, for the ball!

BURGLAR AND BUTLER.

There was once an honest burglar named William Stubbs, familiarly called "Cock Eyed Bill," on account of a slight visual discrepancy. He was a quiet, unassuming individual, who asked for nothing more than to be permitted to follow his peaceful calling without molestation. Perhaps in the golden future when the London county council gets the control of the Metropolitan police his modest aspirations may be realized; but under the existing brutal regime he was subjected to perpetual irritating and tyrannical interference.

As a free born Briton and a man of spirit he resented this state of things very strongly, and, on principle, he never lost an opportunity of assaulting a constable. Consequently he was generally "wanted," and was forced to lead an Ishmaelitish sort of existence, which soured his temper; but neither justice nor prison fare could mar the manly straightforwardness of his character, and if he wanted anything he took it, though there might be a dozen constables around the corner and a long list of previous convictions hanging over his head.

When Bill had a fancy to crack a crib—to use his own homely phrase—he always worked single handed, partly from sturdy independence of disposition and partly because he disliked the profit sharing system. He shrank from haggling, even with a pal, and sooner than do this he had frequently appropriated the whole proceeds of a joint enterprise. This had led to so much unpleasantness—for his associates were not all large minded men like himself—that Bill had for years declined all offers of partnership. The method he usually pursued was to rely entirely upon his own sagacity and courage, but if he chanced to meet with a useful confederate in the shape of a trustworthy butler or confiding cook he did not disdain such assistance.

It was in this manner that the baneful shadow of Mr. Jenkins crossed his path. The shrewdest judge of character is occasionally mistaken, and Bill always considered that he was bitterly deceived by the physiological indications of Mr. Jenkins' open countenance. Mr. Jenkins was the butler of a family in Park lane, and Bill made his acquaintance in the back parlor of the "Pig and Whistle," a snug hostelry much frequented by the betting and sporting fraternity of the neighborhood. A sporting butler who plunged as heavily as Mr. Jenkins did must needs be, thought honest Bill, one of the right sort, and this impression was confirmed by his new friend's entirely voluntary suggestion to put him up to a good thing. His proposal was that Bill should visit the residence of the family in Park lane in the way of business, and bring away with him a few souvenirs from the plate chest.

Mr. Jenkins naively confessed that his object was to recoup himself for losses incurred through having backed a series of wrong 'uns throughout the recent season, and that he relied on Bill's generosity to replenish his exchequer. This explanation was entirely satisfactory to Bill, who possessed enough of worldly wisdom to mistrust disinterested services, and he agreed to Mr. Jenkins' stipulations the more readily because the amount of the reward was necessarily left to his own discretion, and on this point Bill had no fear of doing serious injustice to himself.

It was all arranged so pleasantly and amicably that when the eventful evening arrived Bill walked forth as jauntily as though he had been going for a stroll with his sweetheart. Mr. Jenkins had gone into the country for a day or two, after thoughtfully furnishing Bill with every useful detail. The house was deserted, save by a deaf old housekeeper and a couple of maid servants, who slept on the top story; and a convenient window in the basement had been left unlatched. Bill reached the scene of his operations without the smallest difficulty, and having opened the plate chest by means of a duplicate key he found the contents neatly arranged for transport in green baize bags. Mr. Jenkins had told him exactly where to lay his hand on the most valuable articles, and in a very short time Bill had comfortably stored away his plunder in a sack which he had brought for the purpose.

This done, Bill cast his eyes around and discovered a corner cupboard of which he had been duly advised. It was locked as a matter of form, but disdaining this trifling obstacle Bill proceeded to explore its contents, which consisted, among other things, of ample materials for a cold collation, including half a bottle of excellent brandy. Burglary, as its disciples know, is hungry work, and Bill did justice to Mr. Jenkins' hospitality by making an exceedingly square meal and drinking his health until the bottle was empty. He then carefully shouldered his sack and with a light and joyful heart proceeded to evacuate the premises.

He had hardly gone half a dozen steps along the passage, however, when he stopped suddenly and gave a very suspicious sniff, for it all at once occurred to him that the house was permeated with the aroma of a choice Havana cigar. This was the more extraordinary and startling because upon entering he had noticed nothing of the kind. There was a pungent freshness, too, about the tobacco scent which was very suggestive, and Bill immediately divined that the smoker must be near at hand. He had barely had time to arrive at this conclusion when he noticed in the distant gloom beyond the radius of his lantern's ray a tiny speck of red flame, which glowed brightly one instant and disappeared the next. He immediately turned his lantern in that direction, and discovered, to his mingled dismay and amazement, the figure of an elderly spectacled gentleman seated calmly on the staircase leading from the basement, regarding him with perfect composure.

Bill was so much disconcerted by this unexpected apparition that he completely lost his presence of mind. Instead of putting out his light and making his escape he stood stock still, staring open mouthed at the unwelcome intruder and feeling absolutely panic stricken. In the midst of his bewilderment he suddenly perceived that the elderly gentleman had placed himself in such a position as to bar his passage to the window, which constituted the only available means of exit. Bill no sooner realized this than he was seized with fierce desperation which prompted him to whip out his revolver and rush blindly forward.

"Stand back," said a quiet, thin voice from the staircase; "twenty-two paces is the right distance."

Bill paused abruptly, less in obedience to the stranger's request than because he found himself confronted by the muzzle of another revolver. This was a new and disagreeable sensation. Bill had on occasions used his own weapon so effectively that he felt no desire whatever to become practically acquainted with the contents of anybody else's. He instinctively guessed that his opponent's aim was unerring, and apart from this there was a ring of decision in the cracked voice which seemed to cow him.

"That is right," said the stranger encouragingly as Bill sulkily dropped his arm. "You needn't be frightened, my man; I don't wish to harm you. Come up stairs and have a chat."

The stranger rose as he spoke and stepped aside, inviting Bill to mount the staircase by a friendly gesture of his hand. For an instant Bill hesitated, but only for an instant. He was so dazed and startled that, hardly conscious of what he did, he meekly advanced, and presently found himself in the entrance hall on the floor above. The stranger followed him closely, revolver in hand—a circumstance which accounted in a great measure for Bill's submissive demeanor.

"Step in here," said the stranger politely, turning aside into one of the rooms.

He then proceeded to set light to the gas, and this circumstance, slight as it was, made considerable impression upon Bill, for with professional caution our friend's first step upon entering the house had been to assure himself that the gas was turned off at the meter, and the stranger's action revealed that he had been equally circumspect from his own point of view. The idea that while preoccupied with business his companion must have passed within a few feet of him seemed to Bill a trifle humiliating.

Though he had not had leisure to bestow a thought about the stranger's identity Bill had insensibly arrived at the conclusion that he was in the presence of Mr. Jenkins' master, and he felt somewhat embarrassed and diffident in consequence.

"Pray take a seat," said the gentleman, subsiding into a capacious arm chair. "I am delighted that I happened unexpectedly to come home to-night. It was very absurd of me, but, do you know, I have always regarded your profession as somewhat mythical."

This was Greek to Bill, who nevertheless vaguely resented the imputation, whatever it might mean. But the truth was that the imperturbable coolness or condescension of his companion's tone and manner hurt his amour propre.

"I knew, of course, that there were such persons as burglars and house breakers, but I never hoped it would be my good fortune to come across one. I shall be delighted to have a chat with you. You really must be seated," added his host, in a slightly aggrieved tone.

Conversation under any circumstances was not Bill's forte, and he felt singularly disinclined to prolong the interview; but the elderly gentleman was so pressing that our friend half involuntarily deposited his person on the extreme edge of a chair and stared at his companion with increasing embarrassment.

"I regard your craft, my friend, as a relic of the bold buccaneering spirit which in other days helped to make England glorious," said his host, contemplating him dreamily through the smoke of his cigar. "Civilization has a great deal to answer for. Had you lived in the reign of, let us say, Queen Elizabeth, you might have been a popular hero."

Bill knew nothing of the historical period referred to, but he gathered that the allusion was in the nature of a personal compliment and therefore felt more at ease.

"What we want in these days is a legitimate occasion for the exercise of those talents which you possess. If there were still rich galleons on the Spanish main, loaded to the hatches with gold ingots and pieces of eight, waiting to be captured, do you imagine that your courage and your energy and your splendid disregard of the laws of meum and tuum would not have been directed to worthier objects than housebreaking? My friend, those brawny hands of yours would have grasped other tools than the jimmy and silent matches."

Bill grunted acquiescence, for his imagination was fired by the prospect of rich plunder, whether on the Spanish main or elsewhere.

"The pirate, the corsair, the privateersman, the buccaneer—call him what you will—what was he but a bold, unscrupulous blackguard like yourself? But he had an outlet—more or less legitimate—for his energies and talents; and if he had a successful career he was knighted and became famous. Now, with you, my friend, the more successful you are the less does the community appreciate you."

"You're right there, guv'nor," growled Bill darkly.

"I am glad you agree with me," said his host pleasantly. "It is always satisfactory to have one's theories verified. To my mind," added his companion, "it requires at least as much courage and determination to perpetrate, single handed, a burglarious robbery upon unknown premises as would be needed to storm a fortress or to head a boarding party. For that reason I have felt a sympathetic interest in your profession."

"Wot's your game, guv'nor?" inquired Bill abruptly, thinking this a favorable opportunity to elicit his companion's intentions.

"Ah! yes, you are quite right," said the elderly gentleman, glancing at his watch. "It is getting late; you want to be off, I suppose?"

"Yes," said Bill unhesitatingly.

"I tell you candidly that I don't think you deserve it. "You are a beginner, I suppose—a new hand?"

"I know my business," said Bill, not relishing the imputation upon his skill.

"Well, you see, I heard you. You woke me up. That was really very clumsy, wasn't it?" inquired his host good humoredly.

"I didn't know you was at home," returned Bill, truthfully enough.

"That is an excuse, no doubt," said the elderly gentleman with deliberation. "Still, work should not be scamped under any circumstances. Have you had good sport?"

"It's all here, guv'nor," replied Bill, releasing with a crestfallen air his hold upon the sack which contained the ill gotten spoil.

"Ah! I'm afraid I must ask you to leave it. I cannot very well permit you to carry it off under my very eyes, can I?" inquired the host, as though he were asking the most natural question in the world.

"I'll leave it. I ain't took nothink else, s'help me!" asseverated Bill promptly.

"I suppose my duty to the community is to hand you over to the police. I would very much rather not," said the elderly gentleman, gazing pensively at the sack.

"I ain't done you no harm, guv'nor," whined Bill with humility.

"No, but that is not the point, my friend. You have broken the law, and, as a householder and a taxpayer, I am on the side of law and order," said the host in a paternal voice. "On the other hand, I think I am entitled to consider my own convenience a little. If I gave you in charge it would entail a great loss of time and considerable expense. I should probably have to spend several days in the central criminal court."

"You don't want to be hard on a pore man, guv'nor," murmured Bill, not unmindful that an attendance at the central criminal court would materially interfere with his own engagements.

"I think, considering what a sad bungle you have made of this very simple business, that I need not regard you as a very formidable offender," said the elderly gentleman, with cheerful benevolence.

"I've had all my trouble for nothink, that is true enough," replied Bill, more chagrined by his failure than he cared to show.

"Yes; you have no cause to feel elated, and as you justly remarked just now, you have done me no harm. I suppose I may take it that everything is there," said the host delicately, as he glanced at the sack.

"If you would like to satisfy yourself, guv'nor"—began Bill, in rather an aggrieved tone.

"I should," interposed his host briskly, "if I should not be giving you too much trouble."

Without more ado Bill adroitly unfastened the mouth of the sack and shook the green baize bags out upon the carpet, the elderly gentleman gazing through his spectacles with an expression of mild interest.

"Dear me!" he said, pleasantly, "you made a pretty good haul, didn't you? What is that?" he added, pointing with his foot to one of the parcels.

"I expect that is the silver teapot, guv'nor," said Bill, with a touch of professional pride.

He opened the green baize bag at the same moment and drew forth—a flatiron! For a single instant Bill sat motionless, transfixed with astonishment, staring blankly at the unexpected object which he held in his hand; then with heightening color he abruptly seized one bag, and then another, rapidly emptying their contents on the carpet. In a short time the room was strewn with a remarkable variety of incongruous articles—dumbbells, broken pieces of metal, a few pewter and plated spoons and forks, and even, crowning humiliation, half a brickbat! The elderly gentleman seemed scarcely less indignant than his companion, and he broke the embarrassing silence by saying sharply:

"This won't do, my friend. It is clever, but it won't do. Oblige me by touching the bell at your elbow."

"It's a plant!" cried Bill, with violence, which left no doubt of his sincerity.

"A plant!" repeated his host, eying him severely. "Do you mean to say that you, a professional burglar, seriously believed that these things represented the contents of my plate chest?"

"I was took in, guv'nor; regular rotted, and no kid," said Bill, with abject frankness.

"Really! Is it possible!" exclaimed his host, in a tone of mingled surprise and contempt which fairly made Bill's blood boil. "What do you mean?" he added, after a moment's pause.

"The party who put them things there has got your silver plate, guv'nor," said Bill energetically.

"The party! What party?"

"How do I know?" returned Bill, whose temper was thoroughly roused. "I didn't put them there."

"I have had my suspicions for a long time that my butler, Jenkins, is dishonest," said the elderly gentleman abruptly. "Now, frankly, what do you think?"

"It do look queer, don't it, guv'nor?" said Bill, who felt quite virtuously indignant.

"Come, my friend, it strikes me that we are fellow sufferers at the hands of Jenkins, so I ask your unbiased opinion. Doesn't it look to you as though Jenkins, having appropriated my plate, designed to conceal the robbery and escape scot free by—ahem!—a little ruse?" insinuated the elderly gentleman, knowingly.

"He wouldn't dare. He would know I'd wring his neck," cried Bill fiercely.

"I was surprised to learn from my housekeeper that he had gone into the country. Possibly he anticipated some little unpleasantness," said the host, smiling.

"Curse him! I'll follow him wherever he's gone," exclaimed Bill, rendered furious by the conviction that he had been imposed upon.

"Perhaps you might assist me to get my property back," suggested the elderly gentleman hopefully.

"We'll see about that, guv'nor. Wait till I come up, that's all," muttered Bill between his teeth, rising unsteadily.

"Shall I inform the police?" inquired his host.

"No, guv'nor, leave it to me," said Bill, with an oath. "You've treated me like a gentleman, and I'll act on the square by you. If I can't get your property I'll let you know."

It is to be feared that our friend did not seriously contemplate fulfilling his promise, but the elderly gentleman seemed to entertain no misgivings upon the point, and was profuse in his expressions of satisfaction. He insisted upon giving Bill his card, which bore his name and an address in the city to which communications were to be sent, and showed his visitor out by the front door, with many assurances that he would be well rewarded for his services.

Bill was hardly in a condition of mind to rejoice as he otherwise might at recovering his liberty, for between the humiliation at the ignominious failure of his promising enterprise and wrath at the treachery of Mr. Jenkins his worst passions were aroused. But he nevertheless felt immensely relieved to escape from the presence of the elderly gentleman, who had contrived to inspire him with sentiments of awe and respect, which were very galling to his self esteem.

It was indeed a savage satisfaction to our friend to be able to divert his thoughts from the degrading reminiscence of his recent interview by planning schemes of vengeance against Mr. Jenkins.

With this object therefore he betook himself early on the following morning to an obscure east end tavern, where he had arranged to meet Mr. Jenkins on the morrow of the ill starred enterprise. Of course he did not for a moment expect that the butler would keep the appointment, but he desired to obtain a clew to his enemy's hiding place for the purpose of tracing him. But while he was cautiously making inquiries at the bar the door opened, and Mr. Jenkins entered as coolly as though nothing had happened.

Bill thought it prudent to dissemble his surprise, and presently the two were closeted where they could exchange confidences without fear of interruption.

"Well?" exclaimed Mr. Jenkins interrogatively, evidently disconcerted by the ominous blackness of his companion's brow.

"Well?" repeated Bill in a fiercely ironical tone.

"Did you pull it off?" inquired Mr. Jenkins, whose pasty countenance was beginning to assume in Bill's indignant eyes the pallor of detected guilt.

"What do you think?" said our friend rudely.

"What's wrong?" asked Mr. Jenkins as his jaw fell.

"Nothing. The swag is all right. You've got it stowed away somewheres. That's a blessing, ain't it?"

Mr. Jenkins counterfeited such an admirably blank and bewildered expression on hearing Bill's enigmatical words that the latter, who did not possess the art of diplomatic finesse, felt constrained to explain himself without circumlocution. In a few terse sentences he told his simple story, his suspicions and his intentions, to which the butler listened with extreme dismay.

"You've been kidded!" exclaimed Mr. Jenkins at length, with the addition of some particularly forcible expletives. "The old 'un has took and walked round you. He is a sly fox, is my master; he must have got wind of what was going on, and thought he'd have a game with you. The things were there all ready for you when I came away. You've ruined me and chucked away a first class job."

"That's right—say it was my fault!" ejaculated Bill, somewhat discomfited by this unexpected rejoinder.

"Well, I thought you was a man and not a baby! To go and walk into a trap like that!" exclaimed Mr. Jenkins, with transparent annoyance.

This was more than Bill could stand. A sudden suspicion that Mr. Jenkins' reproaches were not unmerited filled him with blind but furious resentment, and he immediately went for his companion with a vigor and fury which proved quite irresistible. The butler, who was a heavy, unathletic person, succumbed to the attack like a pricked bladder, and raised such an uproar that the unwelcome apparition of a policeman disturbed the harmony of the proceedings.

Bill was ignominiously walked off to the lockup, and although Mr. Jenkins, for private reasons, deemed it inexpedient to appear in support of a charge of assault our friend was affectionately detained by his hosts on other charges, with the ultimate result that he retired from this busy workaday world for a lengthened period into the seclusion of penal servitude. He employed what little leisure he had in anathematizing Mr. Jenkins, for he clung almost pathetically to the belief that he was the victim of that person's deceit, lest he should be forced to the unpleasant and deeply humiliating conclusion that Mr. Jenkins' master had cleverly concerted a highly successful plan for punishing both the burglar and his accomplice at the least personal inconvenience to himself.—London Truth.

A Case of Somnolence.

I was asked to see an old lady in Minneapolis, 82 years of age, who had enjoyed good health.

She was comfortable, lying in bed, pulse 90, tongue clean and temperature normal. The following day when I made my visit to her she was sleeping, and as this was quite late in the day, and she had slept all the time since I had seen her the day before, I feared she had been taking some narcotic; but of this there was no other evidence save sleep. I saw her day after day for three weeks, during which time she continued to sleep day and night constantly, only when awakened to take some liquid nourishment, and then she would perhaps partly answer a question and fall into a sweet and apparently pleasant sleep.

No abnormal condition appeared present otherwise. When the second week came on I thought she could be aroused more readily, and at the end of the third week she could be kept awake by talking with her for perhaps an hour at a time, in the afternoon only. From this time on she gradually slept less, and soon gained strength, her appetite returned, and she was, in a short time, around the house as usual.

During this time of sleep the pulse and temperature remained normal. When she came out of her sleep she was impressed that she was in a hospital, and could not reconcile her surroundings with what she was accustomed to while she had occupied the room in the house of her daughter in which she had slept for a long time.—Medical Record.

How the Car Driver Got Even.

A New York Tribune writer stood on the front platform with a car driver a few evenings ago. He lashed himself into a rage over the many and sudden rings by the conductor for stops. At last he said, "Say, mister, if you will hang on to the rail I'll get square with that man." Then he cut his horses fiercely until they began to gallop. He watched until the conductor was walking through the car to the rear platform. Just as the conductor reached the door the driver said between his teeth, "Hang on, now." He gave the brake a sudden jerk and the car stopped like an arrested cannon ball. The brake was as quickly thrown back, whirling around with a sharp rattle as the car bounded on again.

The conductor had unceremoniously sat down right in the doorway, his back to the passengers. There was a grim smile on the driver's face when the front door was thrown open a minute later, and the conductor, thrusting his head out, asked what in the name of all that was not polite the trouble was. "I nearly ran down an old man," answered the driver, making a dexterous cut at the neigh horse. "Did you hurt him?" asked the conductor. "No, I just missed him." The conductor paused, "I wish I had been the old man," he said slowly, and he closed the door and went back to his platform.

Five Ways to Cure a Cold.

CHOSEN BY THE PRESIDENT.

An Indiana Man Selected as Secretary of State.

Secretary of State Foster is tall, spare, white haired and quite distinguished looking. His complexion is almost too fair for a man and as clear as a girl's, while his blue gray eye, ordinarily rather cold, lights up pleasantly in conversation.

John Watson Foster was born in Pike county, Ind., March 2, 1836. He was graduated at the Indiana state university in

JOHN W. FOSTER.

1855, and after one year at Harvard law school was admitted to the bar and began practice in Evansville. He entered the Union service in 1861 as major of the Twenty-fifth Indiana infantry and was promoted rapidly.

During his entire service he was connected with the western armies of Grant and Sherman. He was commander of the advance brigade of cavalry in Burnside's expedition to east Tennessee, and he was first to occupy Knoxville in 1863.

After the war he was editor of the Evansville Journal three years, postmaster of Evansville four years, minister to Mexico seven years, to Russia nearly two years and to Spain two years.

Returning from Spain in 1885, he located in Washington as a lawyer, serving as counsel for various foreign governments, but in 1890 was again employed by the administration as assistant in negotiating reciprocity treaties. There are now two Indiana men in Harrison's cabinet and two men named Foster.

The Althorp Library.

English writers are beginning to recognize the fact that America is a formidable competitor in many fields. Speaking of the sale of the Althorp library The St. James Gazette says that "selling it in a lump can mean only one thing—selling it to America." It then adds: "We trust that may not happen, since Lord Spencer's collection contains many volumes which it is a national pride to possess—such, for instance, as the famous Valdarfar 'Boccaccio,' which Lord Blandford wrested from the second Earl Spencer for £2,260, to be ultimately bought for Althorp for the bagatelle of £750. It will be an epoch making sale, for this great library contains some 50,000 volumes, mostly priceless. Scarce editions on vellum and large paper, magnificent printing and dazzling bindings by Pasdeloup and Roger Payne, these are its glories. Many of the books, too, have famous histories. They have felt the touch of the Pompadour or of Diane de Poitiers or the elegant grasp of Francis I. There are eighty-two out of the ninety-nine known productions of Caxton, to say nothing of the famous Mentz Psalter, a copy of which has fetched £5,000. To sell the Althorp library, indeed, is almost as though we were going to sell the rarest rarities of the printed book department of the British museum."

Provided for a Pet Cat.

It is getting so that the making of a will generally turns out to be the beginning of a lawsuit. The celebrated legal battles over the estates of Stephen Girard and Samuel J. Tilden are still fresh in memory, and just now the people of Paris are discussing a case that involves less money but more fun than those mentioned. Mme. Dubrai, who died recently, left a small sum of money to the school fund on condition that a certain amount shall be devoted to the support of her pet cat. A trusty person is to be nominated by the mayor, who will undertake to house pussy and give him three meals a day, consisting of such delicacies as lights, liver and heart. It is estimated that, after this charge has been met, there will only be about 200 francs a year left for the fund, and the question now agitating public functionaries is whether that sum is worth the responsibility to be incurred. The courts are to decide the matter.

The Value of Lemonade.

Regarding lemonade a Philadelphia authority says that it is a healthy drink if properly made, and is good for malaria, biliousness and other attendant evils. On no account should it be made in any tin vessel, as the acid of the lemon forms with the tin a poison that is very apt to produce sickness. It is better to drink lemonade without sugar if possible, and in any event it should not be too sweet. A physician who has a great deal of experience recommends a glass of lemonade without sugar before going to bed and another on rising in the morning, about half an hour before breakfast. Lemons should not be eaten clear, but should always be diluted with water.

Soldiers Who Are Deaf Mutes.

At Jacksonville, Ills., is the only silent company of soldiers in the world. Not a man in the company save the captain ever utters a word while on duty or at any other time. They are inmates of the state institution for deaf mutes. Captain George H. Scurlock, one of the teachers of the institution, has organized and brought the company to a high degree of efficiency, and as might have been surmised his greatest difficulty was in devising a code of signals to represent the numerous and complicated orders used in drilling.

G. H. SCURLOCK.

The pupils are quick of sight, and as the gymnasium of the institution is their favorite resort, their average of health and strength is high. Captain Scurlock drilled his deaf and dumb recruits with sticks for guns till they reached such proficiency as to convince the adjutant general of the state that they were worthy of bearing arms, and he issued to them the full accouterments. Their guns are 50-caliber Springfield breechloading rifles, and are kept in the finest order. One would think the difficulties in their way insuperable, yet at the last Memorial Day services they won applause from veterans by the skill with which they went through the manual.

Coquette Versus Beauty.

A born coquette is more dangerous than a beauty. She inherits a better legacy than wealth, for while money gives life its cushion beauty gives its color and coquetry makes it sparkle. The coquette will go on with her conquests while there is a man left in the world with a heart in his bosom. There is a woman in New York who keeps a big boarding school for the education of coquettes, and instead of walking on rose leaves she treads on golden eagles. Seats at her performances are secured two years in advance, and to make the application you pay a handsome deposit. There are no graded courses of study, no exhaustive examinations, no tedious memory lessons and no incessant eternal and intolerable smashing of piano keys.

Aspirants for degrees can go to the Harvard annex. Would be grenadiers are directed to Holyoke and Columbia, and blue stockings are advised to enter local high schools and universities for intellectual force. Here coquetry is fostered and no secret is made about it, either. Square shoulders are rounded into De Milo grace; flat soles are raised by judicious foot coverings; high foreheads sheltered by kiss curls; harsh voices lowered a whole tone; angular elbows turned in; stiff joints loosened and every symptom of a strong mind rigidly suppressed. The pupil is sweetened, softened and curved. She is carefully instructed to know nothing and to do nothing that will rob a grace or mar a smile.

And does she pay?

Doesn't she!

Drop her in the village lane or quiet promenade of her native city, and see if she is not gobbled up by the most promising young lawyer or most prominent bachelor in the town.—New York World.

'Tis Frau Too Tight.

Some funny things take place in a photograph gallery. Once in the early days a good German came to have his frau taken full length to send home, that his old neighbors might for themselves see how handsome she had grown. He had spared no expense to buy her a handsome new gown for the occasion, and it was made up in the latest style when she came to have her daguerreotype taken. We posed her and propped up her head with the nippers, and there she was, the stiffest, most unlovely specimen of a woman that ever was seen. You know it took some time to burn in a daguerreotype, and she began to look fagged before the process was completed.

The operator clapped on the cap at last and ran into the dark room with the negative, leaving her standing. Presently he heard an awful crash, as though the house was tumbling down. Running out he found the husband hopping around, wringing his hands and distractedly crying, "She too tight! She too tight!" His frau had fallen over backward through the background in a dead faint. The operator took in the situation at a glance, and opening her dress ripped her corset strings with one thrust of his knife, when he vows he will never forget to his dying day how a woman he took to be slender seemed suddenly to bulge out into immense proportions. She had veritably laced "within an inch of her life" to have a picture for home folks taken.—Interview in Washington Herald.

Women More Economical Than Men.

A Washington street banker says: "My observation brings me to the conclusion that women who are thrown on their own exertions manage better than men, and will save a little out of a small income where a man would give up or commit suicide. A man thinks it beneath his manhood to make a less deposit than $5. A poor woman with two or three children to support will wash, iron, cook and nurse, take in from $6 to $10 a week for the same, support her little household, buy her children an occasional toy or a little candy, keep her house looking tidy, herself presentable, pay her rent and make a deposit here weekly of from 50 cents up to $1. We have several such depositors in this bank. I never see one of those pale faced, tired out looking women at the window that I do not feel like going out and saying something to encourage her.

"I don't have much time to read, but I do not believe there are any such stories in print as I could tell you, if it were proper to do so. Women stand misfortune better than men. That is my observation. I was in one of the savings banks that went under in this city several years ago. The poor women who were the losers were the heroines. While some of the men who lost raved, went mad and some committed suicide, the poor women went on silent and sorrowful, beginning life again penniless."—Chicago Tribune.

Kate Field Makes a Correction.

At her literary work Miss Field nowadays wears a bright red satin dress reformed after her own ideas, and touched up with frills and shells of soft lace.—Exchange.

I wish the chiel that takes notes would be just a trifle more in love with the truth.

I never had a "bright red satin dress," "reformed" or otherwise.

I don't think a bright red satin dress could be reformed except by annihilation.

I utterly loathe bright red satin, and wouldn't wear it under any consideration.

Bright red satin might be possible for some women in a ballroom or on the stage, but for a working gown it is the worst taste conceivable.

In addition, bright red satin is horribly unbecoming to ninety-nine women out of a hundred. I am not the hundredth.

May this well meant but exasperating paragraph, which has pursued me for months and given me several indigestions, now be buried beyond the possibility of resurrection, even on the day of judgment.—Kate Field.

Mothers and Children.

"The mither's breath is aye sweet," says a Scotch proverb. The same sentiment is less tenderly expressed by a German and a French proverb, "Mother's truth keeps constant youth."

Another Scotch proverb is illustrative of the influence of parental example: "Trot teyther, trot mither, how can foal amble?"

The idea expressed by the English proverb, "The crow thinks her own bird the fairest," takes in German the form of "Every mother's child is handsome," or "No ape but swears he has the finest children."

Every mother knows, though many heed not the fact, that unless she transfers some household duties to the daughter she encourages her child to grow up in sloth and ignorance. An English proverb thus utters the warning: "A light heeled mother makes a heavy heeled daughter."—Youth's Companion.

Perseverance Will Do It.

Mrs. John A. Logan says she has taught herself the use of carpenter tools until able to build a cupboard or put a new shelf in the pantry. Why the Professor Left the Ballroom to Look for Refreshments.

The dry as to marrow, the leathery as to heart, but verdant as to brain, the professor found himself in the ballroom, and, like the fly in amber, wondering how the deuce he got there.

In a bower corner sat the rosebudiest of rosebuds in a garden of exquisitely engowned girls.

"I make it a rule of three, professor," says the rosebud. "I dance three dances only of a night, one in every hour. The first a square dance, to bring my voluntary muscles, with their fasciculi, into gentle play; the second a polka, to work the voluntary muscles into perfect action, and the third a waltz, for absolute enjoyment."

"Bless my soul!" exclaims the professor.

"I employ the interim by following some train of thought. To-night I am seeking types. I want to find my Cleopatra, my Aspasia and my Phyrne."

"Bless my soul!" exclaims the professor.

"Did Cleopatra spend the winter of 40 B. C. with Antony in Alexandria, or was it 41? Did she bare her bosom or only her arm to the asp?"

"Bless my soul!" exclaims the professor.

"Was Aspasia fast or only a flirt? Was Socrates her lover? Was the divorce of Pericles as perfect as a Chicago divorce? Why does Aristophanes ascribe the Samian and Peloponnesian wars to her simply because she lost her lady's maid? Do you think Plutarch's defense exculpates her? Was her second husband, Lysicles, a pork packer or merely a cattle dealer?"

"Bless my soul!" exclaims the professor.

"Was Phryne's mother a laundress, and is it true that she got her living at one time by gathering capers? Were those capers for sauce or boiled legs of mutton? Was her offer to rebuild the walls of Thebes if her name were inscribed on them bona fide? Did she profane the Elusinian mysteries, or was it a put up job to bring her to Hellasts, in order to let the council see her beautiful anatomy? I incline to this, for Apollo painted her as the Venus Anacyomone, and Praxiteles sculped her as the Cnodian Venus. Was Apollo her lover, as well as Praxiteles?"

"Bless my soul!" exclaims the professor.

"You see, professor, I am from Boston."

"Aha!" and the venerable professor bounded like one of his crack pupils in the direction of the refreshment room.—Once a Week.

Fair Warning.

Johnnie, aged 6, had been banished to the bedroom for using bad words to his younger brother, Sam, and told that he must remain there until he was sorry for his misconduct.

After a few minutes of kicking and screaming, and then of quiet, he called Sam to the door to receive the following communication: "Sam, if I'm ever sorry for calling you names—and I'll have to stay here an awful while before I am—the first thing I'll do when I get out will be to lick you for telling on me." Another long pause and he continued: "You'd better be getting ready, Sam, I'm beginning to feel pretty sorry."—Philadelphia Press.

Of Course.

It was a little Fifth ward boy who was walking on the street with his mother, when his attention was attracted by a dog which wagged a stub that showed he once possessed a tail.

"Isn't it too bad," said the mother, "that the doggy has lost his tail?"

"Yes," replied the little fellow, sadly, and then brightening up asked, "But, mamma, why don't they take him to the tailor's shop?"—Elmira Advertiser.

Spring.

In the spring when the green gits back in the trees,
And the sun comes out and stays,
And yer boots pulls on with a good, tight squeeze,
And you think of yer barefoot days;
When you ort to work and you want to not,
And you and yer wife agrees
It's time to spade up the garden lot—
When the green gits back in the trees—
Well, work is the least of my idees
When the green, you know, gits back in the trees

When the green gits back in the trees, and bees
Is a-buzzin' aroun' agin,
In that kind of a lazy "go-as-you-please"
Old gate they hum roun' in;
When the ground's all bald where the hay rick stood,
And the crick's riz, and the breeze
Coaxes the bloom in the old dogwood,
And the green gits back in the trees—
I like, as I say, in sich scenes as these,
The time when the green gits back in the trees.

When the whole tail feathers o' winter time
Is all pulled out and gone,
And the sap it thaws and begins to climb,
And the sweat it starts out on
A feller's forred, a gittin' down
At the old sprug on his knees—
I kind o' like, jes' a loaferin' roun'
When the green gits back in the trees—
Jes' a-potterin' roun' as I—durn—please—
When the green, you know, gits back in the trees.

EDITOR & PROPRIETOR.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 2 1892

The most bitter and rancorous growl of rage at the result of the election yet heard was uttered by the New York Tribune. That paper said that the Republican party was beaten by socialism. When the American people refuse to submit any longer to the system of legalized robbery by which all the profits of the labor of toiling millions are made to flow into the coffers of the father-in-law of the editor of the "Tribune" and other millionaires, they are denounced as socialists. The socialism that in a lawful way redresses monstrous wrong is a good thing for the nation. It will not be forgotten by the American citizens that the editor of the "Tribune" applied to them the same term of reproach he had of late heard applied to the rabble of Paris.

The utterances of Grover Cleveland are at this time worth the careful attention of every American citizen. Every word he speaks in public shows his will to give us a good clean government, not a prostitution of every branch of the government in favor of the rich, but even handed justice for all. In a recent speech he said: "The American people have become more thoughtful and more watchful than they were ten years ago. They are considering now more than they were then political principles and party politics in distinction to party recommendations and the distribution of rewards of partisan services and activities. (Great applause.)

"The situation is one that ought to be recognized by those who are charged with the management of our organization. In the present mood of the people neither the Democratic party nor any other party can gain the support of voters by merely promising or distributing personal spoils and favors of partizan supremacy.

"They are thinking of principles and policies, and will be satisfied with nothing short of the utmost good faith in the redemption of pledges to serve them in their active capacity by the inauguration of wise policies and giving to them honest government. (Wild applause).

"I would not have this otherwise for I am willing that the Democratic party shall see that it is only and successfully meeting the situation by being absolutely true to itself and its professions."

These are not the words of a mere politician but of a statesman and a patriot, and with such a leader on the one side and mere spoilsmen on the other the experience of the late election will be repeated.

"The Begats."

The late Mr. Conington, professor of Latin in the University of Oxford, was noted for his prodigious memory. At a very early age it began to show itself. When he was a child of four or thereabouts he was sleeping one night in the same room with a relative, when, at the dead of night, his voice was to be heard crying out in the darkness from his little cot in the corner:

"Uncle! Uncle! I know the Begats.

Uncle—The what? Go to sleep, my boy, you are dreaming.

Child—I know the Begats. Listen! And he began: "Abraham begat Isaac and Isaac begat Jacob and Jacob begat Judah," and so on to the end, some forty-two generations, without a mistake.—London Tit-Bits.

Too Previous.

"And you won't marry me, Kit?"

"I won't."

"No use talking about it any more?"

"Not a bit. It won't do any good, Hank."

The Oklahoma youth, hurt and angry, reached under his chair for his hat.

"It's my own fault, I s'pose," he grumbled. "I ort to have waited till we'd got a little better acquainted."

"Yes, that's about the size of it, Hank," assented the young woman coldly. "When it comes to courtin you're too much of a sooner to suit me. Good evenin."—Chicago Tribune.

Not the Man in Question.

A laborer in a rough felt hat and long smock walked the other day into the Shakespeare library, and after looking attentively for some time at one of the custodians, went up to him and said, "I say, zur, be you Mr. Shakespeare as I've heer'n speak ov?" The custodian explained to Hodge that he was not the gentleman referred to.—London Telegraph.

The Thumb an Index to Character.

The way in which the thumb is held is a true sign of character. The man who turns it in under his fingers is always weak. That is the position in which it is always held by a child. The thumbs of great men are large and point out conspicuously from their fellow members.—Interview in St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

No part of the body should be clothed so warmly that perspiration is easily induced, since a rapid loss of heat is caused by its evaporation.

Among the Egyptians the bed often was made in the form of an elongated animal, with coverings of fine linen and tapestry of silk or wool.

NOTES ABOUT WEATHER VANES.

Carved Wooden Vanes Went Out with Figureheads in Ships.

When the Phœnician sailor stuck a needle through the stem of a feather and held it out in the wind, he invented the first weather vane, or feather vane. He was nearly equaled by the Indian boy, who was taught to moisten his finger in his mouth and to hold that finger aloft in the air. When that finger grew cold on a certain side the Indian child knew that the wind came from that particular direction. The Phœnicians, however, were probably the first of all civilized peoples to put the vane of feather into practical use.

Since those early days weather vanes have been used in every form and by all races. Modern vanes in their present shapes were first made of wood by traveling carvers and later of copper by tinkers and smiths. They were used on poles, churches, public buildings, ships and were placed on rocky points of land along the seashore. They are now made in every conceivable design and pattern. Horses, cows, deer, eagles, ships, roosters and even pigs are hammered out in copper and used to register the direction of the wind.

The newer vanes have rain cups attached for catching water during a storm. The amount of water that falls is measured by the square inch in a tube under the vane. Wind gauges also are attached. These indicate the speed of the wind. The gauges are small cups hung sideways to the vane. The wind blows them around in a circle and the revolutions are registered by electricity. Nearly all the large weather vanes in town are connected with dials in the buildings below.

The dial is round, like the face of a clock, lettered like a compass, and a revolving hand shows the action of the wind on the vane overhead. Vanes are no longer set in sockets, as it is nearly impossible to keep them properly oiled. They are hung loosely, like a cap on a pivot, and the hollow stem of the vane hangs over the head of the pivot, covering it from rain and rust.

One of the largest vanes ever seen in New York was placed on the postoffice about fifteen years ago. It was so large that it was considered unsafe and was taken down. A good drawing of it is still in existence. The arrow, scroll and banneret seem to be the favorite shapes in vanes at present. The fence jumping horse and the plow are yet found on the grounds where country fairs are held, but they are not in great demand. The tobacco leaf vane is found largely in the south and in Connecticut. The spread eagle and running deer are wind signs in the western states, the deer more particularly in Canada. Malt barrels in copper are placed on breweries throughout the country.—New York Recorder.

The History of Tweeds.

I had not been many weeks in Edinburgh before one of my friends in the cloth trade wrote me from London inquiring about a "coarse woolen black and white checked stuff, made in Scotland and expected to be wanted for trousers," and asked me to send some patterns of it. This was easier asked than performed, for at that period shepherds' checks were only made in plaids, or mauds with borders and fringes. I, however, contrived to cut a small piece from the seam of my brother's cloak and forwarded it. The postage in those days cost 2s. 3d., as the small pattern constituted my note a double letter.

He replied that the article was just what he wanted, and asked me to forward him half a dozen pieces, but at that time I do not believe there was one piece in all Scotland! I, however, soon got them made, and I believe these were the first Scotch tweeds that were sent to London in bulk. My friend was in a position to introduce them into influential quarters, which he did successfully. Increased orders followed rapidly, and he and the firm I am connected with had almost a monopoly of the trade in London in these goods for a considerable time.—Border Advertiser.

The First Iron Ship.

The first iron ship has more reputed birthplaces than Homer. Both the Clyde and the Mersey claim pre-eminence in this respect. Sir E. J. Robison, of Edinburgh, designed an iron vessel in 1816, which was not launched till three years later; and it is said that an iron boat was worked on the Severn even as far back as 1787. Steel was not used in the construction of merchant ships' hulls until 1859. Old salts were not alone in their belief that wood was meant by Providence to float, but iron to go to the bottom. A naval constructor of some repute once said, "Don't talk to me of iron ships; they are contrary to nature." Now none but small craft are built of wood in this country.—Chambers' Journal.

How Modern Greeks Vote.

In Greece at the present day the ballot is a little lead ball. There is a box for each candidate, divided into two compartments. A clerk goes from box to box with the voter, carrying a bowlful of these balls. At each box the voter takes one, puts his hand into a funnel, out of sight, and drops his ball into the yes or no compartment, making a vote for or against the candidate. If he wishes to vote for more than one party there is nothing to prevent him.—New York Evening Sun.

The Trouble With the Pepper.

The late P. T. Barnum, being a pronounced joker, turned also his witty faculty to use. When he told the Adirondack landlord, with great solemnity, that he hesitated to find fault with anything about the hotel when so much was agreeable, he was urged by the landlord by all means to be frank and do so. "Well," said Barnum, "it is only one thing; I have discovered with regret that your pepper is half peas." The landlord declared it could not be; but, on being assured that Barnum knew pepper as well as ginger, he wrote a caustic letter to his grocers about sending him such stuff. They, knowing doubtless who the real complainant was, wrote back that if he would spell "pepper" he would find half of it composed of p's, and that that which they sold had only the amount the orthography required.—Printer's Ink.

The grain crop for one year of the states west of the Mississippi, including oats, barley, rye, etc., at the lowest estimate will reach $500,000,000.

New investigations have compelled the reduction of the estimated population of China from something over 400,000,000 to about 350,000,000.

French Cookery Terms.

With the best of Anglo-Saxon intentions it is sometimes a little difficult to avoid the use of French terms in cookery or a bill of fare. Here are some that one encounters constantly: Releve is no dish in particular so far as the style of preparation is concerned, but answers to the word "remove," and consists of a dish replacing another, a doubling, so to speak, of the same course before going on to the next. It is therefore not unusual to find in a large dinner a releve de potage, releve de rot, de gibier, etc. Entree is a made dish served after the fish or in its stead, where it is not obtainable, and preceding the rots or roast meat. After the latter comes the entremets, i. e., sweets or puddings.

The term hors d'œuvre is the most difficult to particularize. When cold it comprises all side dishes which are really accessories to the meal. As such they can be and are eaten indifferently either before or after the soup; they are always placed on the table when it is being laid, and are often left there until the entrees have been served. They consist of radishes, olives, caviar, boutargue, all manner of salt and smoked fish, sardines, anchovies and a variety of dainties.

Hot hors d'œuvre are almost unlimited; they are very acceptable at large dinners, and are generally served immediately after the soup and before the fish; they are often fried or baked, and are then usually such things as can be dished on a napkin, such as patties, rissoles, croquettes, vol-auvent, etc.; obviously, however, the series can be very much extended. At ordinary family dinners they are often served as and instead of an entree.—Providence Journal.

The Boy Who Discovered the "Saw By."

A few years ago a green country boy applied to the superintendent of a western railway for work, and, somewhat against the superintendent's wish, on account of the danger to life and limb attendant upon such occupation, was given a place as brakeman of a freight train.

On one of his first trips it happened that his train met another freight train at a station where the side track was not long enough to accommodate either of them. The conductors were debating which train should back up to a point where they could pass, when the new hand ventured to suggest that neither should back; that they could pass each other by means of the short side track if the thing was managed right.

The idea excited a good deal of laughter on the part of the old trainmen, but the boy stood his ground.

"Well, how would you go about it?" asked one of the conductors, confident that the lad would soon find himself against a stump.

The boy took up a stick and traced in the sand a diagram to illustrate his plan.

"Good gracious!" said the conductor, "I believe that will do it!"

And it did do it. Today every trainman in America probably knows how to "saw by" two long trains on a short side track, but it is not so generally known that the thing was never done until an inexperienced country boy, who is now the manager of a great railway line, worked out the problem for himself.—Washington Post.

An Expensive Infirmity.

I happened to be in a Broadway optician's store and saw a good looking, well dressed matron with a slip of a girl and a small boy, all of whom wore spectacles. The lady gave some directions about a pair of glasses, and when she had gone I asked the optician whether defective vision is hereditary.

"Rarely," said he. "That lady has four children, and all of them must wear glasses. The father's eyes are sound. The mother and her children are afflicted with astigmatism, a defect of the vision which is almost as rare as anything that afflicts the human eyes. It makes straight lines crooked and parallel lines fade into one. Special glasses must be made and ground to suit each person, and sometimes the respective eyes. They cost five dollars apiece too. So you see a large family of children with astigmatism costs a good deal of money in glasses alone. As the children grow up the range of vision changes, they break or lose their glasses oftener than adults, which increases the expense."—New York Herald.

The Shark Is a Slow Swimmer.

One ill service nature has done the shark, namely, that of placing a triangular fin on his back which acts as a danger signal and gives warning of his approach. Happily, the shark has not been gifted with sufficient sagacity to be aware of this peculiarity, for had he been so he would unquestionably abandon his habit of swimming close to the surface of the water, and would, in that case, be enabled to approach his victim unobserved. The shark is a slow swimmer for his size and strength.

Byron observes, "As darts the dolphin from the shark;" but Byron was a poet, and does not appear to have been a close observer of the habits of inhabitants of the water, or he would have known that a shark would have no more chance of catching a dolphin than a sheep would of overhauling a hare. A shark will keep up with a sailing ship, but it is as much as it can do to follow in the wake of a fast steamer, and a torpedo boat would be able to give it points.—London Standard.

Benzine Cleans Furs.

Nothing cleans soiled fur better than benzine. Actresses immerse their wigs in baths of this liquid with most excellent results. Buy the fluid at a paint store, where ten cents will fill a quart bottle, rather than at the druggist's, where the same amount will cost a quarter. Wash the fur until the benzine remains clear; the first two or three rounds will show fairly black. Be careful not to throw the fluid into any receptacle where by any chance a lighted match may follow.—New York Times.

A Crisis in Spain.

Queen of Spain—Moi gracia! The baby king has the stomach ache.

Lord Chamberlain (excitedly)—Woo-o! Call the secretary of the interior.—Good News.

The coffee crop of Brazil has been so large that the railroads of one of the provinces have for weeks been blocked, every available car being in service, freight depots being crowded and further receipts of coffee being declined.

Major Renard is constantly improving his dirigible balloon, and he has now announced that he has invented a motor of seventy horse power weighing only 430 kilograms.

Narrow Wagon Tires and Bad Roads.

While the subject of new roads is being agitated by the legislatures and the agricultural journals, the farmers are busy working up the subject in a practical—though possibly not in the most proper—way by industriously, and at much expense of time and team, cutting up and destroying the roads by driving heavily loaded, narrow tired wagons over them. When we see a man on a heavily loaded, narrow tired wagon urging along his jaded team, engaged to his utmost power in making mud, and then grumbling because of the "horrid' muddy roads, he seems to be an object for pity.

The only thing he seems disposed to do to make matters different is to throw some hard words into the muddiest places, and then continue his custom of turning out on to the highway with his rut digger every time the ground is too wet for plowing. Now, if the legislature is to do anything for the roads, let them begin by legislating the narrow tires off the heavy lumber and truck wagons. I have seen a single heavy, narrow tired wagon in the distance of a half mile cause more damage than could be repaired in six days of ordinary road work.

The question seems to be about this: Which is the better economy, wide tires and good roads or narrow tires and bad roads? The narrow tires are as much out of place on the farm as on the highway. Men admit that facts and philosophy are in favor of wide tires, and say that when all the others use wide tires they will do so. They seem to be afraid that they will do more than their proportionate share of good in this world. It seems that the legislature may have to help them out of their ruts.—Coleman's Rural World.

Tommy Picked the Police Chief's Pocket.

In Madison, Wis., there is a chief of police, J. E. Adamson, who is clubbing himself. Saturday he visited Chicago to get Thomas Kingston, aged fourteen, who was wanted at Madison for larceny. He had been arrested by Chicago officers. Late in the evening he handcuffed himself to young Kingston and started for the train. Before it reached Desplaines the chief was snoring loud and long.

Kingston is a cunning little rascal. He saw his opportunity. He quietly went through the pockets of the sleeping chief and found the key which unlocked his handcuff. Stealthily he crept over the snoring officer, and when the train stopped at Desplaines the chief and his youthful prisoner parted company.

The train had gone a good many miles when Chief Adamson awoke. Of course he was mad, but when he looked for the key with which to remove the handcuff from his own wrist his wrath knew no bounds, for Tommy had taken it with him. All efforts to remove the bracelet were fruitless, and until he reached Madison his left hand and wrist were buried deep in his overcoat pocket. They were "out of sight."

Kingston was picked up by Chicago officers. He is at the Desplaines street station waiting for another bout with Chief Adamson.—Chicago Tribune.

COURT NOTES.

Geo. M. Gill, Superior Judge.

TUESDAY, Nov. 29, 1892.

Estate of John Morton, deceased—Issued letters of administration.

WEDNESDAY, Nov. 30, 1892.

Estate of Jacob Vagt, deceased—Filed order approving sale of personal property.

Estate of John A. Hannah, deceased—Filed return and account of sales of real estate.

Crocker vs. Blanc—Filed summons.

THURSDAY, Dec. 1, 1892.

Estate of Duncan Campbell, deceased—Filed petition for order to lease certain real estate.

A. O. Collins spent the week at Independence.

W. T. Bunney came down from Bishop early in the week.

George Gilliam came down from Big Pine on Wednesday's train.

Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Green of Lone Pine visited Independence during the week.

J. W. P. Laird Esq., expects to start on his return to Bakersfield to-morrow morning.

Inyo Lodge, No. 221, F. & A. M. will elect officers to-morrow evening to serve for the ensuing year.

D. J. Hessian of Big Pine spent several days in town this week. He returned home yesterday.

There will be a grand holiday opening at Rhine's in about two weeks. Look out for the advertisement next week.

The sheepmen are commencing to leave the valley. The late rains will make plenty of feed in the lower country.

A. M. Byrnes arrived from Hawthorne on Wednesday's train. He says that place has been quite lively since election.

The delinquent sale of the stock of the Independence Track Association will take place to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock at the office of P. H. Mack, Secretary.

O. Hampton and son arrived from Bishop yesterday and started in to-day on the work of moving the pavilion. They expect to have the job completed by the end of next week.

F. A. Daley Esq., of Madison, Wisconsin, arrived at Independence several days ago. This is his second visit to Owens Valley. He is interested in land and water here, more particularly in connection with the Stevens Ditch.

Last Monday William Hughes and Edwin Nottle were blown to pieces in the Sierra Nevada mine at Virginia city. They were preparing to set off some blasts in a tunnel when the giant powder they were handling exploded from some unknown cause, killing the unfortunate men instantly.

The annual statement of the Secretary of the 18th District Agricultural Association is not a creditable showing as to the management of the financial affairs of the society. The sum of $4907.15 was received from all sources and of this only $2,423.50, or less than one half, was paid for premiums and purses, the large sum of $2,505.25 being consumed in payment of incidental expenses.

Here To Stay

David Meacham, his son, Myron P. Meacham, and Archie Bull came up from Redlands, San Bernardino county, a few days ago and are at Georges Creek. Mr. Meacham was induced to come here by reports he had heard of Owens Valley. He says that he finds the country better in every way than he had expected. He has made up his mind to locate here permanently. He says apple growing will be the great business here in time not far distant, and is convinced it will be as profitable as growing oranges at Redlands. He will take time to find a suitable location for planting an orchard and will not go farther north than Independence, with a preference to be some miles south of this place. Among other stock Mr. Meacham brought with him a very handsome stallion of pure blood Hambletonian race.

The Cerro Gordo Election.

When the Board of Canvassers met to canvass the vote, John Thomas, who had been appointed as an inspector of election at Cerro Gordo, presented a sworn statement to the fact that no election was held at that place owing to threats and intimidations and the removal of the election blanks, ballots and booths. There is a provision in the new election law whereby any person voted for at a general election may petition the Governor to order an election to be held in any precinct where no election had been held on the proper date by reason of the loss or destruction of the ballots intended for that precinct. Acting under the provisions of this section J. N. Yandell forwarded a petition to the Governor, accompanied by the sworn statement of John Thomas, asking that an election be held at Cerro Gordo precinct. On Wednesday evening of this week an election proclamation was received from the Governor ordering such an election, and it is expected that the Board of Supervisors will meet on Monday next and make the necessary arrangements for holding such election on December 13th in conformity with the provisions of the Governor's proclamation. There are three offices in which it is possible to change the result by the eleven votes to be cast in Cerro Gordo. D. J. Hessian was elected Clerk by seven majority. H. H. Howell was elected Coroner by six majority, and John Wilson was elected Supervisor of the Fourth District by two majority. It is said that several men who were at Cerro Gordo on election day have since left and will not return to vote. To change the result Yandell must receive ten of the eleven votes to be cast, Woodin must receive nine and Stewart seven. Should this election change the result in any way the validity of the proceedings will of course be tested in the courts.

A Yard of Pansies.

By special arrangement with the Publishers, we are enabled to make every one of our readers a present of one of these exquisite Oil Pictures 36 inches long, a companion to "A Yard of Roses," which all have seen and admired. This exquisite picture, "A Yard of Pansies," was painted by the same noted artist who did the "Roses." It is the same size, and is pronounced by many art critics to be far superior to the "Roses." The reproduction is equal in every respect to the original, which cost $300, and accompanying it are full directions for framing it at home, at a cost of a few cents, thus forming a beautiful ornament for your parlor or a superb Christmas Gift worth at least $5. Send your name and address to W. JENNINGS DEMOREST, 15 East 14th St., New York, with three two cent stamps to pay for the packing, mailing etc., and mention that you are a reader of the INYO INDEPENDENT, and you will receive by return mail one of these valuable works of Art.

Quite a heavy storm prevailed throughout the State early in the week. At San Francisco the shipping was blown about the bay and considerable damage done. The rain was most welcome as feed in the lower country was getting very scarce and the crop outlook was particularly blue. The high Sierras are now heavily covered with snow and prospects for plenty of water next year are bright. The weather cleared up yesterday and the 1st day of December had far more the appearance of the 1st day of April.

A Heifer in a Bathtub.

A number of cattle were landed at the Weems line wharf yesterday morning. Their driver was James Groucher. The animals seeming quiet, Groucher started to drive them without any ropes. On reaching Conway street a heifer, which had been moving along very placidly, became very much animated, and made things very interesting for the balance of the herd. The street being too wide for her she danced up an alley between 129 and 131 Conway street. A gate blocked her way, but only momentarily. Through it she went, and then another obstacle presented itself, Mrs. Emma A. Poole, who proved to be no more of a stop to the heifer's onward progress than Fort Carroll would be to a modern man-of-war. In a moment Mrs. Poole was knocked to the ground, and in the kitchen it went. There some destruction of property was committed, but not enough to satisfy the heifer.

The dining room was next entered, where the well known quadruped-in-a china-shop scene was re-enacted. The hallway was then taken in, and a lamp was knocked down. The heifer wanted to conquer higher worlds, so she went upward into a bedroom. Here, temporarily, repose was sought on the bed, but it fell under the animal's weight, other damage being done during this occurrence. From here, the weather being warm, her heifership went into the bathroom and hopped into the bathtub. Mrs. Poole then commenced calling for help, and, with the assistance of a blue coated soldier, drove the animal out, and she at once sailed up Hanover street and there entered another house, but did no damage. The driver finally caught the animal—Baltimore American.

An Infatuated Tomcat.

Miss Ethel, daughter of D. W. Pease, of West Carrollton, is the possessor of a Maltese cat. Early in the spring the cat deserted his place in the house and took up his abode with the chickens, remaining day and night in the chicken yard. He soon formed an attachment for an old black hen, which was reciprocated, and the two became inseparable. Thus matters went on for some time, when the hen, remembering that the usual season for multiplying and replenishing her species had arrived, selected a nest in the poultry house and made known her intentions in the usual way. She was at once supplied with the necessary eggs and commenced business. This, it was supposed, would end the rather strange flirtation and Tommy would return to his mat on the porch, but not so. Judge of the surprise of the family on going to the poultry house the next day to find that his catship had taken possession of the adjoining nest with the nest egg and was sitting in the most approved fashion.—Cor. Dayton (O.) Herald.

A Gaudy Uniform.

Warden Aull has adopted a novel method of keeping track of such convicts as are continually planning to escape. Thursday morning he surprised three of the most incorrigible by dressing them up with a flaming red flannel blouse and cap. Across the back of the blouse in plain view is a broad white strip of canvas marked in large, plain letters, "Convict No. —." The pants are the regulation stripes. It was a great surprise to the convicts.

As they marched to the canal they were subjected to a great deal of raillery.

The warden says these three have kept the officers and guards busy for some time trying to keep run of them. With these suits on they can be easily watched from the various posts and their every movement noted. All who attempt to escape hereafter will be treated in like manner.—Folsom (Cal.) Telegraph.

Georgia's Profits from Fruits.

The Georgia fruit crop is a big thing this year, and everybody is interested in knowing what the growers will make out of it. In the peach and grape crops alone conservative estimates show that about 500 carloads of peaches and 100 carloads of grapes will leave the state for foreign markets during the present season. The estimated receipts for the peach and grape crops combined are $750,000.

Reports show that the peaches are well formed, of good size and perfectly sound, and this, together with the decrease in yield from last year, makes good prices and ready sales an assured fact. Other important fruit crops will largely swell the total sales, and lots of summer money will be put in circulation where it will do good.—Columbus (Ga.) Enquirer-Sun.

"German Syrup"

Justice of the Peace, George Wilkinson, of Lowville, Murray Co., Minn., makes a deposition concerning a severe cold. Listen to it. "In the Spring of 1888, through exposure I contracted a very severe cold that settled on my lungs. This was accompanied by excessive night sweats. One bottle of Boschee's German Syrup broke up the cold, night sweats, and all and left me in a good, healthy condition. I can give German Syrup my most earnest commendation."

International Boat Racing.

It is possible that there will be an international rowing match arranged before the close of the rowing season of 1892. For some time past an informal correspondence has been carried on between the president of the Oxford University Boatclub and the rowing men of both Harvard and Yale colleges in the United States. The medium of communication was Mr. Chase Mellin, an old Brasenose oar, who is at present residing in the states. The idea was to bring Oxford against the winners of the Harvard-Yale match. Harvard has always expressed a willingness to ratify an international match if such a thing was possible, and the only hitches likely to occur were the locale and the time. In an interview with R. C. Lehmann, the coach of the Oxford crew, that gentleman says:

"The Oxford University Boatclub is very anxious to arrange a match with the winner of the Yale-Harvard match this year. Informal communications have, I believe, come from the other side of the Atlantic, and have been answered by Mr. Fletcher, who is now president of the O. U. B. C."

Mr. Lehmann thought that a race might be arranged on the river Thames, between Putney and Mortlake, in the month of September, and that Mr. Fletcher and his companions expect to get a favorable reply is an open secret. It is a well known fact that a joint committee of Harvard and Yale has favored this project for some years, and it was the intention of the Americans to invite a representative crew of English college rowers to Chicago next season to take part in the national regatta there. It is more than probable that the winners of the Harvard-Yale race will meet the English rowers on the river Thames this year, and then ask for a return contest next year at Chicago.—London Sporting Life.

Worth Twenty Thousand Dollars to Him.

I. N. Locke, of Wayne county, Ind., was formerly an active trader. In May, 1872, he was in Chicago and bought a lot for a small sum. He put the deed in an envelope and placed it in his pocket with other papers. A few days afterward he lost the envelope and all its contents. He advertised for it, but really cared only for the notes, thinking the lot of little value. John Ritchey, a victim of softening of the brain, was wandering aimlessly on the street the day Locke lost his papers. He found them and laid them away, and even after his death no notice was taken of the supposed worthless papers. A short time ago John Ritchey found the package and gave it to Mr. Locke, and through his attorney his claim has been established. Had the deed remained concealed a few days longer the twenty years would have expired and no claim allowable. It is a lot in the boulevard addition, and the parties occupying it have given Mr. Locke $20,000 for a quit claim.—Chicago Letter.

An Imprisoned Genius.

Alberto Lopaz, who was taken to Yuma recently to serve a two years' term for burglary gave his personal effects to his friends about the jail. Deputy Barry was presented with a facsimile of the Episcopal church made out of pasteboard. Lopaz could see the church from one of the jail windows, and he reproduced it almost perfectly. He borrowed a knife from Deputy Sheridan with which he cut up the pasteboard, and then made paste from flour with which to stick the pieces together. It is a piece of workmanship to be proud of. The greatest production of Lopaz while confined in jail here is a reproduction of the magnificent Merchants' exchange building in Guadalajara. The entire affair is constructed of paper. On the inside of the building are the stairways, etc., each perfect in its construction. The prisoner must be possessed of a memory much stronger than most men are, to remember every detail of that large structure for a number of years. However much genius the man possessed, he has made bad use of it.—Phoenix Herald.

Troublesome Seals.

The salmon fishermen down the river and bay are having trouble this spring from the seals, as usual. These pests are multiplying rather than decreasing and are causing great losses to the weirs. While the seals of the arctic regions have the reputation of being slow, stupid animals, hunters killing them with clubs, those on the Maine coast are the sharpest game to be found. They will go in and out of the salmon weirs, either by force or strategy, and eat all the fish they want. They are very hard to get a shot at, and when hit sink to the bottom, the carcass thus being lost to the gunner. One fisherman remarked on a recent Saturday that there was a small fortune in store for the man who would invent a trap that would catch seals and hold them. The bounty upon them doesn't seem to do a bit of good.—Bangor (Me.) Commercial.

The Coral of Commerce.

This is the product of a species of coral insect. When first taken from the sea it is itself covered with a polyp crust, though entirely calcareous in substance. This coral is found in large quantities in the Mediterranean, where it flourishes, not far below the surface of the water. Both red and rose colored coral are found, and in some years the yield of the whole of this sea has amounted in value to half a million of dollars.—J. N. Hallock in Christian at Work.

A funeral was in progress at Hicking Grove church, near Dashville, Mo., when lightning struck a barbed wire fence to which many horses were tied. Twenty-one were knocked to the ground and four killed. Mrs. Robert Rigirie, in the church, was shocked insensible and badly burned about the face.

THE BACHELOR'S COAT.

Old coat, for some three or four seasons
We've been jolly comrades, but now
We part, old companion, forever;
To fate and the fashion I bow.
You'd look very well at a dinner;
I'd wear you with pride at a ball;
But I'm dressing to-night for a wedding—
My own—and you'd not do at all.

You've too many wine stains about you,
You're scented too much with cigars;
When the gaslight shines full on your collar
It glistens like myriad stars.
That wouldn't look well at my wedding,
They seem inappropriate there;
Nell doesn't use "diamond powder;"
She tells me it ruins her hair.

There's a reprobate looseness about you
Should I wear you to-night, I believe,
As I came with my bride from the altar
You'd laugh in your wicked old sleeve
When you felt there the tremulous pressure
Of her hand in its delicate glove
That is telling one slyly, yet proudly,
Her trust is as deep as her love.

So go to your grave in the wardrobe
And furnish a feast for the moth!
Nell's glove shall betray its sweet secret
To younger, more innocent cloth.
It's time to put on your successor;
It's made in a fashion quite new;
But, old friend, I'm afraid it will never Set as easily on me as you!

—Boston True Flag.

A GRATEFUL OUTLAW.

The day I arrived in Adelaide, Australia, I was 20 years old, and my pocket contained a dollar for every year I had lived. Luck was with me. On the second day after my landing I hired to a sheep raiser who had a ranch on the Murray river, near its junction with the Darling, and on the third we started off up the country. We had two ox teams—that is, we had two covered wagons, each loaded with supplies and each drawn by three yoke of oxen.

It was about Christmas time, and the weather was very sultry, and we aimed to make only fifteen miles a day. We had a full week's journey before us, and nothing of much interest happened until the fourth day. We went into camp a little earlier than usual on that afternoon, as one of the wagons needed repairs. Our vehicles, after coming to a halt, stood about twenty-five feet apart. While I was building a fire to cook supper by one of the blacks went off after rabbits, and McCall took the other with him to help cut and bring back a lever with which to raise the wagon off its wheels. I was thus left alone for a few minutes, and they had scarcely disappeared from sight in the scrub when a man burst out of the thicket on the other side and came running up to me. His face and hands were scratched and bleeding, his clothing in tatters, his hat gone, and he had such a wild and terrible look that I should have run away from him had I been able to do anything but stand and stare with mouth wide open. McCall had told me of escaped convicts and hard cases who had taken to the bush to make a living by robbing, and the man had come upon me so suddenly that I was knocked out for the moment.

"For God's sake, young feller, give me a bite to eat!" he said, as he stood before me. "Don't be afraid of me—I'm a sheep herder who has been lost in the bush for three days."

I stepped to the wagon and handed him a piece of bacon, some hard crackers and a handful of tea, and then found voice to ask:

"But why not stop with us for the night?"

"Thanks, but I'm in a great hurry to get back to my herd. I know where I am now, and can get there in three hours. Any matches?"

I gave him some, and he looked all around to make sure that we were alone, and then said:

"Young feller, do me a greater favor still. Lend me your pistol and knife until to morrow, when you will pass my station. And, furthermore, be kind enough not to mention to any one that I was here. Do this and you shall never regret it."

I handed him knife and pistol, promised what he asked, and he shook me by the hand and disappeared in the scrub. Ten minutes after he had gone I figured it out that he was a bushman who had been hard run by the police, but it was all the same to me. He could have taken what he wanted for all of me, as I felt perfectly helpless, and I was thankful that he had come and gone without knocking me on the head. Just as McCall came up with the lever there was a clatter of hoofs, and I looked up to see five mounted men ride into camp. They were in the uniform of the patrol, and the appearance of the horses and men showed that they had had a long ride of it.

"Well, Capt. White, what is it?" asked McCall, who seemed to know every one of the five.

"Been after Ballarat Sam again," replied the captain as he dismounted.

"And lost him?"

"Yes; curse the luck! We struck him near Dobney's yesterday morning, and he led us a chase of fifty miles during the day. We killed his horse about dark last night and had him surrounded in the scrub. He got out, however, and we did not get his track until about noon today. We followed it to the creek, two miles above, and there lost it. Haven't seen him here, of course?"

"I only wish we had. There's a reward of £500 on his head, I hear."

"It has been increased to twice that. Show me his body and I'll make a rich man of you."

The patrol turned their horses loose and had supper with us, furnishing a part from their own rations. Then there was general talk and story telling until about 10 o'clock, and then all but one man turned in for sleep. I had been introduced all around, but had taken very little part or interest in the conversation, being sure, from the first words spoken by the captain, that I had met Ballarat Sam and aided him to make a fresh start. I thought at first of telling the whole story to the patrol, but they were serious, sober looking chaps, and I had a fear that they would give me an awful raking down, even if they did not lug me off, and seek to have me punished as aiding and abetting. I remembered, too, that I had solemnly promised Sam not to betray him, and so I decided to keep a still tongue and let the case work out as it would.

The patrol left us at daylight, but their work for the next three days was thrown away. They could get no trace of Sam. We continued on up the country, and finally arrived at the ranch, and for the next six months I was hard at work as a sheep herder, and neither saw nor heard much of the outside world. Then one day I was called in off my range, which was about five miles from Davidson's house. I went in to find a couple of visitors there—two gentlemen who had lately arrived from England. One of them, a Mr. Cullen, was from my own town of Shrewsbury, and the other, a Mr. Williams, was from Manchester. They had come to Australia to take up a range and go into sheep raising as an inventment, neither of them intending to remain, but to do the business through an agent. They had purchased 2,000 sheep of Mr. Davidson as a starter, and had taken a range above us on the Darling river. My flock was to go, as also that of the herder to the south of me, and we had been called in to receive instructions. Both of us herders were to enter into the employ of the new arrivals, who had already secured their land and built the house and stables for the overseer. This man had come up from Adelaide with them, and was a scotchman named McFarland. The other, who was an Irish lad of 20, was O'Hara.

When we made ready to start the two gentlemen were mounted on horses. The overseer drove the bullock wagon, assisted by a black, and O'Hara and myself were on foot. On the third night, when at least ten miles from any settlers, and more than that from any regular highway, we found a natural valley in which the sheep could be herded, and our own camp was made in a grove of ironwood, near a water hole. We had finished supper and were grouped about the fire when one of the dogs barked, and we looked up to find ourselves covered by five rifles. There were five strange, hard looking men forming a half circle about us, having crept up into the grove so softly that the dogs had not heard them until the last moment.

"Brail up or under you go!" shouted a voice, and every one of us threw up his hands.

"Now, then, the first one of you who makes a shy move will get a bullet! Close in, boys!"

The five advanced to our feet, each keeping his gun leveled, and when I could see the man who had spoken I at once identified him as Ballarat Sam, the man whom I had befriended months before. He recognized me almost as quickly, and taking a step forward said:

"Well, boy, you did me a good turn that day, and I'll not forget it. Move over to the left. Now, then, gents, who are you?"

The gentlemen gave him their names and told him their business. They were pretty badly frightened, as I could see, while the overseer trembled like a man in a chill. As he was a big, strong fellow, and had laughed at the idea of bushrangers meddling with us, I could not understand his fear until Sam spoke again.

"Better and better!" he said, as a fierce look came into his eyes. "Boys, here's that overseer who set the patrol on our track down below, and who wasn't satisfied with that but must turn out to help them. I think we have made a good haul of it."

All our arms were in the wagon, and we were helpless to offer any resistance. The first thing they did was to despoil the two gentlemen and the overseer of everything of value, and then each one was lashed to a tree. O'Hara was ordered to sit down beside me, and the black took matters so coolly that nothing was said to him. The rangers signed to him to turn to and get supper, and he cheerfully obeyed. When they had eaten and drunk and lighted their pipes Sam turned to me with:

"And so you didn't tell the police that you gave me food and a pistol?"

"No, sir."

"I know you didn't, for I was that tired out that I laid myself down for two hours almost in your camp. Even when they told you who I was and that a price was set upon my head you hadn't a word to say."

"No, sir."

"Well, you boys have nothing to fear. We have nothing against you. After a lay or two you may go free."

There was no sleep for anybody until after midnight, and I don't think the two gentlemen or the overseer slept at all. I know they were wide enough awake when I opened my eyes in the morning. All of us had a bite to eat after the outlaws had finished, and then the wagon was robbed of whatever they fancied, and hauled off about thirty rods and upset in a deep gully. The oxen were turned loose with the sheep, and when we set out Sam and two of the men rode the horses and the rest of us went on foot. One outlaw on foot went ahead and the others closed up behind us, and the general direction was to the north. Every mile took us into a wilder and more unsettled country, and it was so broken that I felt that I could not get out even if turned free.

At about 4 in the afternoon we reached the rangers' camp, which was in a wild and desolate spot. I don't think they intended the gentlemen any harm from the start, but that the overseer's doom was sealed we all felt certain. He realized it, too, for I observed that he was constantly on the watch for an opportunity to bolt. It came as we entered the camp. Realizing that they meant to pay off the old score he suddenly dashed for a thicket. He took them off their guard, and if an accident had not happened him he would have got clear off. Half way to the thicket a stone turned under his foot and threw him, and as he got up one of the men shot him down in his tracks. They left him lying there and went into camp, saying that they had meant to torture him with fire and that he had got out of it too easy. The two gentlemen were very closely guarded, but O'Hara and myself were allowed to walk about as we pleased. They had taken over £1,000 from the two and bore them no grudge, but for five days and nights we were prisoners and in their power.

On the morning of the sixth day, when it was plain to be seen that they were off for another adventure, the four of us were turned loose and told to make our way home. They headed us to the west, which was the wrong way, and we traveled twenty miles in that direction before we found out the trick. We were nearly a week in the scrub, living on roots and berries and decayed wild fruit, before we reached a settlement, and were then all of thirty miles from Davidson's. We were a sad looking lot when we finally reached home, and while Mr. Cullen was taken with fever to die in about ten days, Mr. Williams was so broken up that he lived only long enough to get down to the coast. A year later Sam and two of that crowd were caught, tried at Sandhurst, and O'Hara and I saw them drop from the gallows. They had asked us to identify Sam in court, but we had excused ourselves. He was a bad man, with the blood of many victims on his hands, but he had given us our lives and played fair.—New York Sun.

Sir Walter Raleigh's Irish home in Youghall, County Cork, which belonged to the late Sir John Pope Hennessy, M. P., was put up for sale by Messrs. E. & H. Lumley, in the Auction mart, Tokenhouse yard. The house is a fine specimen of Elizabethan architecture. It was there that Sir Walter smoked the first pipe of tobacco in Ireland and received an unexpected bath from a faithful servant maid, who, on seeing the blue smoke emerging from her master's mouth and curling around his head, thought Sir Walter was falling a victim to spontaneous combustion and threw a pail of cold water over him to extinguish the conflagration. Only £1,250 was bid for the property, which was accordingly bought in by the auctioneer, who said he could not think of selling a historical mansion like it for such a figure. —London Telegraph.

Telephone from Paris to Bordeaux.

At 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon the new telephone line between Paris and Bordeaux was opened. Complimentary messages were exchanged between the presidents of the chambers of commerce of both cities, and the minister of commerce, and the mayor of Bordeaux. The telephone works exceedingly well, every word being clearly heard. Before concluding the Elysee telephone was hitched on and a complimentary message sent through from Bordeaux to President Carnot, to which he replied in suitable terms.—Galignani Messenger.

Snow in June, but None in Winter.

THE HERCULES.

In placing the Hercules Gas or Gasoline Engine in the field in competition with other gas engines, we do so with the utmost confidence that we are "in it." Our system of operating this engine is so far ahead of all others that it needs but an introduction in any community to insure an immense sale. A woman can handle it. It requires no engineer. It can be started in an instant. No electric spark to get out of order. It oils itself. It beats all others. Write Palmer & Rey, 405-407 Sansome St., San Francisco for particulars. The price and capability will surprise you.

For Simplicity it Beats the World. It has Fewer Parts, and is therefore less likely to get out of order than any other Gas Engine now built.

Daily Newspaper and Job Office.

We have used your four horse-power "Hercules" Gas Engine for nearly two months now, and have not yet failed to get our edition off on time; on the contrary, we find it the best investment we could have made. For convenience it cannot be beat. Unlike the steam engine it is clean, no coal to shovel into a furnace, no fires to get up, no water to watch to keep the boiler from going through the roof—indeed it is simple and economical in all respects, and we feel that in changing from steam to gas we have secured a donation of $100 per year to the office, independent of all other considerations, and that means that $100 is the difference in the cost of fuel per year between steam-power and gas power. Thanking you for past favors, including the great service done by you in putting an engine like the "Hercules" on the market, we are,

Yours truly, PENNYCOOK & HARRIER,

A Leading San Jose Printer Says.

The two horse-power "Hercules" Engine bought last December, more than fulfils every promise you made for it. Am running two jobbers and a Cottrell Cylinder with it, and I am satisfied it would run as much more machinery with ease. I have not had the least trouble with it, and I can cheerfully recommend your engine to any one desiring a reliable and economical power. Have had considerable experience with other makes of gas engines, and do not hesitate to say that the "Hercules" beats them all. The hollow "tube" is a great improvement over the unreliable "spark," and what especially pleases me is that your engine developes more power than you claim for it—something that cannot be said of any other make of gas engine coming under my notice. I never bought a piece of machinery that has given me the satisfaction your engine has.

Printers Pleased With It.

We beg leave to report to you on the success of one of your "Hercules" Gas Engines which is now in operation in our office. It is a one horse-power, and readily runs a large power press, and a jobber at the same time, and is then not working up to its full capacity. We have had no trouble whatever with the engine, and for neatnes, convenience and power we consider it the best in the field. We are delighted with it, and with the experience had with it, and can heartily recommend the "Hercules" Engine to anyone. Truly yours,

GENTLEMEN:—I believe I have now given your Gasoline Engine a fair test, and am ready to say that it answers satisfactorily to all you claim for it. It is easily started, steady in action, sufficiently powerful, and cheap in cost of running. I use gasoline gas in running it. It has increased my output of soda water 1,000 dozen per day.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

ON THE WAY TO PARADISE.

Let us hope that the people who habitually disregard their health will reach that desirable place, and avoid the locality which is less desirable as an eternal residence on account of the heat and surroundings generally. But while we tarry in this vale of tears, why should we voluntarily endure the tortures of dyspepsia when a systematic use of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters will rid us of the atrocious malady which—unless physicians are very much at fault—tends to shorten the term of our existence. Heartburn, biliousness, constipation almost always accompany this complaint and are symptomatic of it. These are all extinguished by the Bitters, which also conquers completely malaria, rheumatism, nervousness and debility. Since the appearance of "la grippe" it has shown a singular mastery over this formidable complaint that has carried off so many of our brightest and best.

An optimist is a man who believes that all eggs will hatch.

SCYTHE SONG.

Mowers, weary and brown and blithe,
 What is the word methinks ye know,
Endless over word that the scythe
 Sings to the blades of the grass below?
Scythes that swing in the grass and clover,
 Something still they say as they pass;
What's the word that over and over
 Sings the scythe to the flowers and grass?

Hush, ah, hush! the scythes are saying,
 Hush, and heed not, and fall asleep;
Hush, they say to the grasses swaying;
 Hush, they sing to the clover deep;
Hush, 'tis the lullaby time is singing;
 Hush, and heed not, for all things pass;
Hush, ah, hush! the scythes are swinging
 Over the clover, over the grass!

A CUP OF COFFEE.

During the war my father was living in a portion of the south where the country was overrun with a band of wretches known everywhere as "The Robbers." They lived simply on plunder, nothing else. They were freebooters that did not dare show themselves among honest people in the daytime. They followed no honest avocation in the day or night. Their meat, drink and wear were all obtained in maraudings.

All valuables had to be kept hidden away from these thieves, though when they entered one's premises every nook and corner was ransacked for things which they carried away with a remorselessness unknown before among Christian nations.

Once in a night raid upon my father's house—they had robbed him half a dozen times previously—among other treasures that were unearthed by the villains from the cloisters of privacy and sacredness was several pounds of genuine coffee which my mother had been for years hiding and keeping for occasions of sickness or "rainy days." When the robbers produced this before her eyes, displaying it with a fiendish flourish and hellish glee, it was the last feature that broke the patient spirit, and she denounced the act with all the severity of terms she could command, appealing to the manhood of the villains for a return of her coffee, if of nothing else, for the sick dependent upon her, and it was for these that she begged.

All the "manhood" that was exhibited on the occasion was the brute force that overpowered an old gentleman and a few ladies. Revealing itself further one of the villains seized the aged matron—my mother—by her cap and forced her face in a succession of shocks down into the vessel containing the coffee, and telling her at each time, to "smell of Abe Lincoln"—"smell of Abe Lincoln"—"and Abe Lincoln coffee." Of course I would yet shoot that ruffian did I know where to find him anywhere this side of torment. I'd shoot him even at the expense of that little religion I have referred to, though I do feel that I should not be held to divine accountability for the act.

But here is an incident of an entirely different character, yet one also in which you may think that the "religious scruple" was held in abeyance or banishment entire, but I not agreeing with you there.

Once, when sick and traveling over the North Carolina railway, I got off the train at the usual breakfast house, and presenting myself at the dining room door I asked the landlord for simply a cup of coffee.

"I want only the coffee, for I am sick. How much?" These were about my words. The reply was, quickly:

"Five dollars—where's the money?"

"But, my friend," I insisted, "that is the price of the regular breakfast; I want only the coffee—nothing else, for I am quite sick."

"I haven't time to fool with sick fellows now; if I let you in there there is no telling what you will do."

I saw there was no use of parleying with him, so I paid the five dollars and entered the dining room—though there was something then in my brain besides the active pain; nor was there much of the cum grano salis, for there was a resolution to bear, if possible, something besides the grain of salt, plus the coffee.

There was the usual scramble for position and plate, the well fellows elbowing me to the most remote table. I begged the waiter to bring me a cup of coffee as soon possible. At the very last moment it came.

I drank the fluid yclept coffee—and was about to leave the room, when it occurred to me that I had paid honestly for the "cup" also; and so, with a sans souci movement, I took possession of the purchase, dropping both cup and saucer into the haversack on my shoulder.

I then went on my way rejoicing—rejoicing in three things: The beverage had relieved my suffering, for hot water, you know, is a specific for many ailments. Secondly, I had, for once in my life, got even with a hotel man; and thirdly, I had made a most valuable and permanent addition to our camp chest, thus long exhibiting a deficit in the way of white granite table ware. My conscience did not then reproach me, nor has it since reproached me in the latter act, though you may consider it a little honest stealing if you wish to. The bluff, curt landlord had expressed to me his opinion that if I entered his dining room I would as likely steal as eat if he was not watching me, and so he had charged me for the possibilities in the case. I looked at the thing in that way. You pay your money and you get what you can in the dining room—that was about the philosophy of his table and his pot.

Doubtless the pallor of my look, the general wretchedness of my countenance under the suffering of the sickness, these may have given the fellow the idea that I was really a thief, and, of a necessity or a prudent forethought, I should be forced to pay beforehand for what might be done.

But I got the cup of coffee—cup and all—and as I have said, went on my way rejoicing.

In the beautiful lines of Mazeppa, there are found these, barring the slight transposition, etc.:

Time makes all things even,
 If we do but bide the hour.

A few months after my purchase of the "cup of coffee," I was sitting in front of my tent (in eastern South Carolina, where we were picketing in front of Newbern) when a civilian rode up and spoke to me. I at once had recognized in the man the landlord who had taken me for a thief, and who had made me pay in advance for things he supposed I would take. I had on a better suit of clothing, for I had in the meantime received promotion, and was then donned in an officer's uniform. Perhaps I was also looking a shade better in the face than when we first met, for I was quite well now.

A dozen thoughts had passed through my mind in rapid succession. It occurred to me that some one had informed on me, and that the fellow had a warrant for my arrest on a charge of larceny! My! What could I have done? But I recollected at once that there was no civil law; no courts then, none except those of the drumhead—and I could defy the man there.

But the party seemed to be unusually affable and polite, and I felt at once that he did not recognize me and that I was a person against whom he could not possibly have aught, but that I was one whose grace and service he was about to propitiate. He wanted my friendship at once. Perhaps he was like that Dutchman who, not knowing into whose hands he was likely to fall in the great judgment, was as ready to say "Good Devil" as "Good Lord"—he wanted to be sure of a friendly reminder in any event.

There were the usual salutations and inquiries about news, etc., followed by a cordial invitation on my part for the gentleman to dismount and allow the servant Jack to care for his horse.

"No," he says, "I am hunting something to eat. Can you tell me where I can find it? You seem to be well fed here."

I confess that the closing reflection was somethin of a "stunner"—though it could not possibly have reference—could it? to the meal or the hot water and sorghum "sweeting" which I had swallowed at his house? The vexing problem flew across my brain rapidly, but I said:

"Very good. Dismount and have a stool with us. We will have some cornbread and sorghum soon. Hurry up the coffee, Jack!" I had mildly strung out all this in a single breath, not giving the stranger time for his amiable protest, which came immediately after.

"Oh, hello! That's not what I'm after. Excuse us. I'm running a hotel at —— (I won't now tell on him), and I've run out of supplies, and have come down here in the hope of finding an 'Egypt,' where I can get something for you folks to eat when you pass"——

But I modestly interposed with a desire to correct him, for he was treading on corny ground. "Excuse me, my friend," I said again, "but I never had the pleasure of eating at your board" (though I had drunk there). This latter information for him I was holding in reserve for the opportune moment.

"Have you not? Why, I thought I recognized your face."

"Good Lord!" thought I, "does he know me sure enough? And do I still look like a thief?" The fellow was certainly making things warm in my brain, but I didn't care a cent, for I was now on my own ground, at least was in front of my own tent, and I knew that I had more friends there than he could muster, for Jack, the cook, was on hand. He was my friend, and he constituted the majority. But the man's face betrayed not the least sign of malicious motive, and I thought I saw a clear coast, as the fellow anxiously added:

"Can you tell me where I can find something for my table—chickens, eggs, meal, wheat, potatoes—anything in the world to feed the starving soldiers on as they pass?"

The gentleman appeared just then very solicitous about starving people—$5 for a grab game at his table. But I insisted on his getting off his horse and dining with me. I told him I could give him something that wouldn't make him sick; but it appears that he didn't take the hint. I called Jack and had the stranger's horse cared for. I then invited the gentleman into my tent, where I could offer him good water and clean towels—things not always visible at a Confederate hotel. I actually had a comb, which was also a rarity in those days; and, really marvelous to relate, there was in my tent a genuine mirror—a real good looking glass—in front of which I sometimes stood, not, however, with that constancy charged upon the great man whose name I bear in baptism, and of whom it is said that the only place ever worn away in the carpet of his private chamber was in front of the mirror. The Brussels cut through by his heel—the heel of Martin Van Buren—as he turned in the delightful inspection of his own august person. But—

Bidding the guest to make himself at ease I excused myself and retired for a moment—called up Jack and whispered to him that I wanted the very best dinner he could get. Furthermore, I told him we must have made some genuine coffee, and that when he served the beverage he must give to the stranger the new white cup and saucer, well and appropriately filled. "All right," said Jack, with a knowing air, though he did not know all things connected with that cup's history; my messmate did, however. (But about Jack and his knowledge I will tell you later.)

Jack thought he was getting dinner that day for the governor, a bishop, or some other grandee, and so he spread himself He had the best and most sumptuous dinner I ever had in camp. He placed the white coffee cup, filled as directed, at the side of our guest—an act which Jack performed with a gusto that had prophecy and suggestiveness in its grandeur. Myself and comrade, the quartermaster's clerk, compromised on tin cups.

I imagined the fellow looked very inquiringly at that cup. It was a large, white granite vessel, with handle, and I had no doubt but that it reminded the man of home. But our guest was enjoying the good things Jacob had set before him—enjoying them to such an extent that home, or his public table, at least, should have been forgotten. Myself and comrade, who was into the cup's history, endeavored to give to the meal as much cheer, welcome and zest as was possible, I awaiting the opportune moment to throw a startling bomb shell into the ear of the guest.

He had finished his coffee; and I asked him if he would have a renewal of the Rio.

"Why, yes!" he replied most eagerly; "your coffee is most delightful—the genuine article"—(his was not). "Where can I get some? What price?" etc.

"Do you recognize the cup?" I asked, looking across the table in merriment—my sides fairly ready to burst with the laughter suppressed.

"Well, no!" said my man. "But it does look like some I used to have—all gone now—stolen by the roguish fellows going into my dining room."

"Yes, and my friend," said I naively—with the innocence of a martyr, "and I stole that one! Don't you remember the occasion?"

The man involuntarily dropped the knife and fork in his hands at the moment, looked at me in a quizzical horror, and then said sharply:

"Well, I will be cussed! You don't say so?" Then he gave the cup an inspection.

"I do say it," said I, most earnestly, with the smile on my face big as a grown sunflower gazing at the orient, though there was no "cussedness" in the words.

My guest heaved a huge sigh, while I explained in the pleasantest way possible how I had, one morning when sick, paid him $5 for a "cup of coffee," considering it a fair transaction—$5 for it all. I had appropriated the whole—coffee cup and contents. That was all of it!

The man laughed heartily, ordered another supply of the beverage and some more of Jack's fried chicken. It was now "hands round" with us all, but I told him that I was going to see to it that he did not do as I had done—carry that cup and saucer away with him when he left the table.

At this he laughed again most heartily. In fact, we all enjoyed that dinner—the cup of coffee and its revelation—no one more so than our accidental visitor, and he was so delighted and paid back by our hospitality and cheer that never afterward would he charge me for coffee or bread taken at his board.—M. V. Moore in Atlanta Constitution.

MAKING LEATHER.

Modern Improvements Have not as yet Affected the Tanning Trade.

ANCIENT METHODS STILL EMPLOYED

The Process of Converting Hides into Leather Minutely Described.—Visit to a Large Establishment.

Modern ingenuity has changed the character of almost every business in existence within the last fifty years, but there is one which still retains its primeval simplicity. That is the manufacture of leather. The one thing needed to make good leather is time, and as modern machines tend to eliminate that element they are of no use here. The ancient and honorable occupation of the tanner stands proof against innovations.

Notwithstanding that fact there is an immense amount of leather made, and Cincinnati's output for a year reaches the enormous quantity of 432,000 hides, valued at $4,680,000. Of this fully half is made at one tannery, which is the largest in the world.

It was to this tannery that a reporter betook himself yesterday to see how the old fashioned business was conducted. The obliging superintendent took him in hand, and for one hour and a half the pair marched steadily onward, upstairs, down elevators and through villainous smells.

The first room entered was the bark store room, where there was an immense pile of 40,000 cords of chestnut oak bark. This is obtained from Kentucky, Tennessee and Alabama, and enough is kept stored for a year's use. At one end of this room is a machine, into which two men are kept busy feeding the bark to be ground up. The tan bark was left for awhile and the hide room was visited. This is below the level of the railroad track, and a trap door opens in the ceiling, through which the hides are dropped from the cars. Most of the hides come from Chicago, but for patent leather those brought from Paris, France, are the best, as they are larger and thicker. Rough hides range in value from $3 to $10, according to grade. They are here sorted, weighed and put into packs of 134 hides each, and one hide of each pack is numbered. The whole pack is started at once, and comes out finished at the same time. By means of a rope attached to the numbered hide the location of any pack can be ascertained at any time.

Next comes the beam house. Here the hides are soaked in clear water for three days, receiving four changes of water in that time. Thus thoroughly soaked they are plunged into lime water and left for five days. One more day in fresh water and they are run through a machine at the rate of 512 daily and have all the hair removed. Next they go to the beams, which are boards about five feet long, inclined to an angle of forty-five degrees and having a longitudinal convexity upward and being covered with zinc. Upon these the hides are thrown flesh side up, and the flesh side scraped off with broad bladed knives. The bits of meat go to the glue factories and the hair is used by plasterers. Another soaking in fresh water and they are taken by the strokers, who work them three times on beams to remove any short hairs or lime that may remain. From here they are put into fresh water again, then suspended on sticks in very weak tan liquor for two weeks. They are perfectly white when introduced into this liquor, but come out slightly tanned or brown.

They are then taken into a large room, the floor of which is simply planks laid over large vats. Into these vats a hide is thrown, fresh bark is scattered over it, and another hide is placed on top, etc., until the vat is filled. The whole is submerged in the strongest tan liquor.

While these are soaking let us see how the liquor is made. In a large room there are thirty-two leeching vats, each 16 feet in diameter and 10 feet deep. In a new tannery these must be filled with fresh water and ground bark, but in an established tannery liquor is used. The fresh bark is flooded with strong liquor, and when this is drawn off weaker liquor is put on the same bark, the vat being allowed to stand eight days each time, and then weaker liquor is placed on the bark, till at the thirty-second time it is pure water; or, in other words, fresh water is put on worn out bark, then transferred to fresher and fresher, until when put on new bark it is strong liquor. The exhausted bark is burned in heated ovens and generates an immense amount of steam.

The hides taken from the vats were packed with bark and suspended on frames in tan liquor for two weeks. Here as in the leeching process an old tannery has an advantage. The fresh liquor is put on the hides that have been longest tanning, and as the strength is taken out by the hides the liquor is run over fresher hides until at last it is run over perfectly fresh hides and into the sewer. Thus the longer a hide has been tanning the stronger liquor it is subjected to.

From the vats the hides are taken to be scoured by a brush and stone in a machine. They are then dried. When perfectly dry they are tempered by being dampened with fresh water. They are then polished with copper wheels worked by machinery in the manner of a huge flatiron. This is the last touch given to sole leather. Belting leather is sold in the rough without this last polishing. Belting is, however, made here, and only the best stock is selected for that purpose. The hides are first cut into short strips of the proper width, soaked and scoured, dried and stuffed. Stuffing consists in applying a coat of oil and grease to the damp leather. It is then dried and the oil is absorbed by the leather, after which the grease is scraped off, the strip dampened and put into a frame, where it is subjected to a great strain in order that it may lose all elasticity. It is then removed to the belt department, where it is glued or riveted into belts.—Cincinnati Times-Star.

Aged at Nineteen Years.

An important bit of local history has been discovered at Salem in connection with a tombstone in the old Charter street burying ground. In the uttermost corner of this ground is a stone bearing this inscription:

"Mr. Nathan Mather died October ye 17th, 1688. An aged person that had seen but nineteen winters in this world."

The meaning of this peculiar inscription has long been a matter for conjecture among local historians. In his "American Notebooks," Nathaniel Hawthorne refers to it and says: "'An aged man at nineteen years,' saith the gravestone. It affected me deeply when I cleared away the grass from the half buried stone and read the name."

The mystery has been solved by the discovery in the Essex institute of a book entitled, "The Genealogy of the Mather Family." By this book it appears that Nathaniel Mather was born July 6, 1669, and was a brother of Cotton Mather and a son of Increase Mather.

At the age of twelve years he had thoroughly fitted for college, and he was graduated from Harvard at the age of sixteen. At twelve he had read the Old Testament in Hebrew and the new Testament in Greek, and was able to converse familiarly in Latin. He was distinguished not only for his complete mastery of languages, but for his attainments in mathematics, philosophy, history, theology and rabbinical learning as well. At the time of his graduation he delivered an oration in Hebrew upon the state of learning among the Jews.—Boston Journal.

Where Columbus Got His Idea.

Mediæval Europe knew but very little of eastern and northeastern Asia. Many of the most learned cosmographers of the time taught that Asia stretched eastward indefinitely, and no one imagined that it had an eastern coast washed by the ocean. It was seriously taught that eastern Asia was a land of vast swamps, inhabited by monster serpents and dragons. This was the opinion that still prevailed up to within 200 years of the time of Columbus.

At this time two Venetian merchants by the name of Polo went on a vast trading expedition to the uttermost parts of Asia. They were gone many years. Upon their return the son of one of them, a young man named Marco Polo, wrote out a full account of their travels, described the empire of the grand khan (the Chinese emperor) and revealed the fact that Asia was bounded on the east by a vast ocean. He described this eastern coast minutely, with all its vast cities and its wealth of precious stones and spices.

It was from reading this book that the imagination of Columbus was fired, and he conceived the bold conception of reaching this eastern coast of Asia by sailing toward the west around the earth.

So when he discovered Cuba he had not a doubt that he had landed upon the coast of Asia, and that he looked upon the same scenes that Marco Polo had gazed upon 200 years before.—Yankee Blade.

The Floating Weeds in the Atlantic.

The gulf weed (Fucus natans) which, with its litle round "berries," is not unlike the mistletoe in form, but of a brownish yellow color, has been thought to have lost its property of rooting on rocks and to have acquired the power of living afloat. It has even been suggested that the sea marks the site of a submerged continent, apparently the lost Atlantis. Dr. Krummel holds that the weed has simply been drifted to its present position by the Gulf stream and its affluents from the West Indian islands and the Gulf of Mexico.

It is now proved that the Gulf stream is not a single narrow "river of the ocean," as Maury poetically described it, but consists of a number of currents, not only from the Mexican gulf, but the Antilles. The weed, according to Dr. Krummel, would take fifteen days to float as far north as the latitude of Cape Hatteras and five and a half months to reach the Azores. In the Sargasso sea it becomes heavy and sinks; but the supply is kept up by the Gulf stream.—London Globe.

Advice for Young Journalists.

A correspondent asks, "How shall a young man proceed who desires to become a reporter?"

Let him apply to the city editor of the paper on which he hopes to get a job. If he can bring a short letter of introduction it will not hurt him; but he doesn't need any great wad of recommendations. He should know what he can do in the way of reading and writing English, be prepared to say how old he is, if he speaks German or French, or any other foreign language; if he is in good health, if he drinks; he doesn't want to be fresh, nor does he want to be a chump. He wants to get rid of the idea that the paper needs him, but wants to impress it on the city editor (not by talking, however) that he is a good man, and that if he has had no experience he will nevertheless learn. Some papers prefer green men; they don't have to unlearn so much.—New York Sun.

Long Services in Wales.

In Wales the Sunday evening services generally last two hours. Now there can be little doubt that a service lasting two hours on a summer evening is considered too long by working men and women who have been hard at work six days running. If our chapels are to retain their hold, especially in English towns, the services must be made shorter. I have seen an advertisement from which it appeared that in one Nonconformist chapel the services are "brief, bright, brotherly." But that was not in Wales.—Liverpool Mercury.

Left Luggage.

Irate passenger, as train is moving off—Why didn't you put my luggage in as I told you?

DEATH WEEK.

A Singular Ceremonial Which Take Place in Rural Russia.

SACRIFICES TO THE WATER SPIRIT.

Drowning a Horse in the River to Appease the Wrath of Vodyanoi.—A Survival of Paganism.

"Death week," the "Smartna Nedelya" of the Slavonic people, marks the end of winter in rural Russia. It is kept during the last seven days of March, and is a survival pure and simple of early paganism. In the old Slavonic mythology, as in the minds of the mass of untaught Russians nowadays, the idea of death and winter is closely associated, and the ceremonies proper to the "death week," from the sacrifice to the "Vodyanoi," or water spirit, with which it begins, to the driving out and drowning of death, with which it terminates, are based upon the superstition that was formerly universal in northern Europe. That writers on Russia and the Russians have given no account of the "death week" celebration is due, no doubt, to the fact that it takes place at a time of the year when travelers are rarely tempted to visit Russia, and is confined to rural districts out of the beaten track, which are unlikely to attract foreigners.

When the ice begins to break on the water, winter is considered over in Russia, and the breaking of the ice is due—the Russian peasants hold—to the "Vodyanoi," or water spirit, who has his abode in the rivers and streams. He has slept over the winter, they say, and awakes hungry and angry with the first rays of the returning sun. He bursts the congealed covering of the water, sends the ice floes drifting, drives the fish from their haunts and causes the streams to overflow.

In the last week of March therefore, before the ice begins to break, the peasants in rural Russia start the "death week" celebration by preparing a sacrifice for the "Vodyanoi," so that he shall not be kept waiting when he awakes from his winter sleep. They meet together in the village where the celebration is to take place and subscribe a sum of money for the purchase of a young horse. The animal must not be a gift, but bought for money; it must not be bargained for, and no one person must contribute more than another to the amount required.

The horse is taken to a stable specially reserved for the gift to the "Vodyanoi" and fed for three days on bread and oilcake. On the fourth day, at midnight, the horse is taken from the stail and conducted to the nearest river or stream, the villagers following in a body. The mane is decorated with red ribbons, the head smeared with honey, the legs are tied together and a couple of millstones secured to the neck. Then a hole is made in the ice and the horse thrown into the water a living sacrifice to the "Vodyanoi."

Fisher folk in the Archangel district pour a quantity of fat into the water instead of throwing in a horse, and the millers of the Ukraine cast the horse's head into the river and not the living animal. After appeasing the water spirit, the house spirit, the "Domovoi," calls for a sacrifice. He awakes on the night of March 25, and will wait only three days for his offering. So on returning from the river side the villagers prepare a suitable gift for him. They take a fat black pig, kill it and cut it into as many pieces as there are residents in the place. Each resident receives one piece, which he straightway buries under the doorstep at the entrance to his house.

In some parts, it is said, the country folk bury a few eggs beneath the threshold of the dwelling to propitiate the "Domovoi."—London Spectator.

Morality of Circus Life.

As regards the morality of circus life, the occupation of the performers forbids that they should indulge in dissipation of any kind. Even if inclined in the direction of vice they have no time to indulge in it. On the road they rise at 7 or 8 o'clock, leave the sleeping car and breakfast at a hotel and have a morning rehearsal. Then come dinner, the afternoon performance and supper, then the evening performance, and at 12 o'clock, or an hour and a half after they are through work, they must be in the car again or a severe fine is imposed.

In winter the stars go to Europe and perform in the heated circus buildings or stay at home and practice. It is a hard life, but it is as good as any other honest calling, and I cannot recollect a single scandal that has been proved to lie at the door of a circus actor.—Denver Sun.

America's First Lighthouse.

The first lighthouse built on this continent was at St. Augustine, Fla. Its chief use was as a lookout, whence the Spanish people of the town could see vessels approaching from Spain or get notice of the coming of foes in time to run away. The tower attracted the attention of Francis Drake as he was sailing along the coast with his fleet of high pooped ships on his way home from pillaging the cities of the Spanish main. So he stopped long enough to loot the town and destroy what he could not take away.—Washington Star.

A Story of Joseph Jefferson.

Joseph Jefferson relates in The Century he following concerning a London experience of his: "My approaching appearance was the important dramatic event of my life. I had been five years from America and was on my way home and I felt satisfied that if this new version of 'Rip Van Winkle' succeeded in London my way was quite clear when I returned to the United States.

"On Sunday evening, being alone in my lodgings, I got out for my own admiration my new wig and beard, the pride of my heart, and which I was to use in the last act. I could not resist trying them on for the twentieth time, I think; so I got in front of the glass and adjusted them to my perfect satisfaction. I soon became enthused and began acting and posing in front of the mirror. In about twenty minutes there came a knock at the door.

"'Who's there?' said I.

"'It's me, if you please,' said the gentle but agitated voice of the chambermaid. 'May I come in?'

"'Certainly not,' I replied; for I had no desire to be seen in my present make up.

"'Is there anything wrong in the room, sir?' said she.

"'Nothing at all. Go away,' I replied.

"'Well, sir,' she continued, 'there's a policeman at the door, and he says as 'ow there's a crazy old man in your room, a-flingin' of his 'ands about and a-goin' on hawful, and there's a crowd of people across the street a-blockin' up the way.'

"I turned toward the window, and to my horror I found that I had forgotten to put down the curtain, and, as it seemed to me, the entire population of London was taking in my first night. I had been unconsciously acting with the lights full up, to an astonished audience who had not paid for their admission. As I tore off my wig and beard a shout went up. Quickly pulling down the curtain, I threw myself in a chair, overcome with mortification at the occurrence. In a few minutes the comical side of the picture presented itself, and I must have laughed for an hour. I had been suffering from an attack of nervous dyspepsia, consequent upon the excitement of the past week, and I firmly believe that this continuous fit of laughter cured me."

Caution in Sailing.

You have had an agreeable fair weather sail. But suppose the weather is a little stormy, or the breeze fickle and squally. Then you must sail under reefs. You have noticed those rows of little cords sewed to the sail at intervals, parallel to the boom. Those are the reef points, and are used to tie the sail down when it is necessary to reduce canvas. Never fasten them around the boom; that's a landlubber's way, and provokes mirth among sailors and yachtsmen; but tie them under the lower edge of the sail. You will also perceive a rope fastened at the outer edge of the sail and leading through the end of the boom. This is to "outhaul," or stretch, the sail and is the reef pennant.

Now then to reef your boat for a hard blow first set the sail at the proper height, tie the reef points as directed, outhauling the sail with the reef pennant, and then set up the halyards. The easiest way to reef a boat is when at anchor or fast to a mooring; but you will often have to put in a reef under less favorable circumstances. In that case, slack down the peak halyard and lower the throat halyard until the sail is where you want it; then reef as before, and be lively about it, too, or you may get into trouble. Reefing a small yacht in squally weather is dangerous at all times, and a man alone in a boat finds it all that he can do. Make it a point to know how to take a reef before you venture out far upon the water, for the task of reefing requires both a practiced hand and a steady nerve.

Should you be caught by bad weather in such a fix that you cannot safely take a reef at once, lower the peak of the sail. This will reduce the canvas and still leave your boat manageable. It does not look pretty, but it is safe.—F. W. Pangborn in St. Nicholas.

Sounds Like Fiction.

A lady entered a down town store, made her purchases and departed.

"Do you know who that is?" asked the salesman of a friend, who replied that he did not. And then this story was told:

"She is Mrs. ——. She and her husband had a misunderstanding several years ago. They separated, but neither applied for divorce. She applied herself to a business that was honorable and remunerative. He followed his business as before. They did not cross each other's paths during the separation until the event of which I am going to tell you occurred. He sickened and became delirious. At one time there were doubts as to his recovery. The wife was in the city at the time attending to her business. She heard of her husband's illness and called. He did not recognize her. She attended him until her business called her away.

"Soon after her departure the husband began to rally. As he recovered he said to a friend that he had thought of his wife a good deal during his sickness; that he had fancied at one time that she was near him and attended him. The man said this tenderly. The friend to whom he related it caused it to be communicated to the wife. I don't know what the details were. I only know that a few weeks ago I saw in one of the newspapers that the husband of whom I have been talking bought a handsome residence on one of the avenues, and not long thereafter he moved into it and she went with him. That's all."—Chicago Tribune.

Consider This Well, Girls.

Don't think your sweetheart mean if he doesn't take you to the theatre often.

I wonder how many of you ever stop to think, while you are sitting near to your sweetheart at the theatre, how much it cost him or whether he can afford it?

If he doesn't get the best seats in the house you think him mean, and if it is a warm night, and he doesn't treat to soda, buy bonbons and plums then you think him meaner still.

You know you can't help letting a faint little sigh escape if you happen to see one of your more fortunate sisters dash by in a carriage.

Usually he pays from $2 to $3 for the seats; then if you live at a distance there is the car fare.

Could you, on a very small salary, pay your board, clothe yourself and take your sweetheart to the theatre in style more than once a year?

I couldn't.

Don't expect too much.

RESUSCITATION.

Possibility of Bringing Apparently Dead People Back to Life.

ELECTRICITY AS A REVIVIFIER.

Lives That Might be Saved if Properly Treated.—Cases Where the Dead Were Restored to Life.

The unfortunate case of the mind reader, Bishop, upon whom a too previous autopsy was performed, is likely to effect a lasting good to humanity. Before it occurred cases of apparent yet not real death were held to be so extremely rare that not one in a thousand of the sensational reports of such were believed by physicians to have any foundation whatever; but they have been carefully studying the subject and making thorough investigations, and the most of them are now ready to accept that persons are too often considered as being dead when they are not so in reality. Many such cases, absolutely authentic, have been reported.

Dr. Clark, of Indianapolis, tells of several recent cases in his section. One was that of a woman in Steubenville, O., who was pronounced dead by six physicians, and yet life returned after fourteen days. Another, or a woman in St. Louis, in whom only a slight sign of life was accidentally discovered just before the coffin was to be closed. M. Brouardel, a French physician, has written upon this subject and brought out much of interest. He considers that the newly born, also young children and aged and enfeebled persons, are especially predisposed to apparent death. He believes that in infectious diseases and algid fevers there are a good many examples of resurrection; the ptomaines he considers to have characteristic anæsthetic properties; injected into a frog, the latter assumes any given cataleptic properties that may be desired.

The physician is most apt to be deceived by hysterical persons, who are capable of living like hibernating animals. In persons convalescing from grave diseases syncope is easily induced at the moment the patient rises; the deficient cerebral circulation and venous stagnation in the lower limbs are favorable conditions to the occurrence of apparent death. M. Brouardel relates the case of a criminal who was hung in Boston at 10 a. m., taken down at twenty-five minutes past 10 a. m. and transferred to the anatomical amphitheatre an hour thereafter, when his pulse recommenced to beat. On opening the thorax the pulse was seen to beat forty a minute, and it stopped beating at a quarter to 3 p. m. Hoffman tells of a similar case.

THE DEAD BROUGHT BACK TO LIFE.

During the past two years many cases of recovery after apparent death from electricity have been reported, and in some of them there was no sign of life for between two and three hours. M. Leister recorded seven cases where the subjects, under the action of lightning, had remained apparently dead for periods varying from several minutes to three hours. Physicians who took the observations stated that no pulse could be felt at all, the excitation having been strong enough to stop the heart's action. A few years ago scarcely a physician could be found who believed it possible for a person to return to life after having been buried even for a day. But now the fact finds ready acceptance that people have been buried from eight to fifteen days and yet been resuscitated.

An interesting and physiological fact bearing upon this subject has recently been brought out by experiments upon dogs with curare, the substance which the South American Indian uses to poison his arrows. This poison paralyzes the lungs first and afterward the heart, and when given to dogs they generally fall apparently dead within five minutes. But in all instances where artificial respiration was commenced before the heart stopped and persisted in for a sufficient length of time, recovery took place, the heart being by this means kept at work until the poison was eliminated by the lung. Accidents in which occur much the same physiological changes as are produced by curare are not very infrequent, and from these conclusions of value can be drawn. Deaths under chloroform and ether are occasionally reported. In this class of cases the hope of resuscitation would seem to be even greater than is usual in those of sudden death.

Where a person who has been under treatment appears to have died, even if suddenly and unexpectedly, it is quite a common custom of the relatives among all classes to depend upon their own diagnosis of death and to at once lay out the body, send for the undertaker, etc.

WHAT PHYSICIANS MIGHT DO.

The doctor is usually informed of the unhappy occurrence; seldom, however, until several hours afterward, the principal object of notifying him being to prevent his making another visit. Very likely, in consequence of this custom, many lives are lost which might be saved were the physician called at once and efforts to resuscitate were made by him.

There is one point to be considered in this connection. In cases of sickness people generally show the least possible sense. It is a notorious fact that in every case of death, except from some such chronic disease as consumption or cancer, they will lay the blame on the attending physician, if it is a possible thing to do. Were he called in directly after a patient of his had died and he at once employed artificial respiration or tried to stimulate the heart by hypodermic injections the chances are that the relatives and friends would jump to the conclusion that he had been giving a medicine in overdoses, and had poisoned in consequence and was now endeavoring to resuscitate his victim. The more intelligent reader would think this absurd, and yet a few years in the practice of medicine would convince him to the contrary.

Dr. Clark, in advising young physicians, urges them in cases of death by drowning not to fail to use electricity in their efforts to resuscitate. He says that a fine point of differentiation as to the probability of resuscitation in a case of drowning is whether it was suicidal or accidental, for a suicide cannot be saved after five minutes of submergence, but the accidentally drowned may be submerged twenty and possibly thirty minutes, and yet be resuscitated. The horror and revulsion of feeling and fear of death of the latter are not present in the former, and this influence on the mechanism of the heart may account for the difference. "Persevere in your efforts, as life has been restored in drowning cases after four hours' work.—Boston Herald.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 9 1892

At the present session of Congress an effort will be made to improve the laws of immigration. It is high time that some check was put upon the garbage dump of Castle Garden. Cholera germs might be imported now that would remain dormant till next spring. No such chance should be taken, especially in view of the Chicago Fair. Of course no law will be passed that would exclude desirable immigrants. Intelligent, thrifty people will always be welcome.

It is remarkable that just after the result of the election became known eastern manufacturers began to give notice to their employees of an increase of wages. There were no strikes nor threats to strike. The increase of pay was a voluntary act on the part of the employers. The advocates of high tariff were always promising increase of pay for workers but instead of that there was a decrease in the pay of labor and of value of all kinds of farm products. The fact of increased pay is of more value to workers than promises that were always false.

A Republican paper commenting on the result of the election says: "It is no wonder under such circumstances that socialism has developed to an extraordinary degree within a year. It is growing all over the world, but in no other country has a great party taken up its cry of plutocracy and given its leading tenets official sanction as has been done in the United States. The result of the recent election was in a larger degree due to this social unrest fostered in this way by the Democratic party than to any other cause." The paper from which the above is quoted is owned by millionaires and echoes another millionaires' paper, the New York "Tribune." These papers cannot or will not see that the great unrest of the toiling masses is caused by seeing the profits of their toil wrung from them to swell the colossal fortunes of a few men. When millions of workers become fully conscious that they are being robbed under forms of law there will be "social unrest," and where those millions have a voice in making laws there will be reforms. If we had not the ballot-box we would have revolution. There is more intelligence now in the United States than there was in France one hundred years ago. Therefore the ballot-box has taken the place of the guillotine.

In the history of mankind there appears to be times when some particular desire or craving is paramount. It has long been noticed that the commission of an unusual crime, a strange murder or suicide, has been followed by more of a similar kind. Every age has had some one man a special type of the craving or desire predominant in his time. The lust of power, extended empire, culminated in Augustus, and when the ideal Man was tempted it was with rule over all the kingdoms of the world. The "crowned criminals" the "splendid madmen" of all ages have been but the outcome of the spirit that prevailed among the men of their time They were typical men. Jay Gould was a typical man. He was the outcome and best representative of the terrible passion for wealth that now prevails. As he came into the world his nature may have been as good, or even far better than the average. But the fever, the burning desire for wealth that raged around him siezed his heart and brain and made him in finance what Alexander Caesar, Atilla, Charles XII and Napoleon were in war.

It mattered not if thousands were ruined, if men were driven to madness, women to shame and children to the gutter by any of the great schemes of Jay Gould, he pushed his plans to their final conclusion. Human misery was no part of his object. It was merely incidental; therefore no concern of his, and he was indifferent. In all probability he gave away a great deal of money in alms, but the knowledge that alms was needed never made him hesitate to carry out plans that made more paupers. Unless the mad desire for riches that now rages among us shall abate, and the terrible energy of Americans be directed to nobler and more beneficent ends, our government and whole civilization will go the way of all nations who have been before us. Perhaps a change in the laws that enable a few men to seize and hold the earnings of multitudes might help to create a better spirit.

Society in Creede.

That there is a strong and distinct social caste in Creede, despite the practical democratic conduct of the masses in their business intercourse, was luminously exemplified by an event of no inconsiderable proportions at the Brainard & Bebee hotel on the evening of Feb. 22. It was the initial hop given by the fire company in commemoration of Washington's birthday. Tickets of admission were issued, and the closest vigilance was kept on those to whom tickets were given, lest some improper characters would gain admission to the dancing hall, which was the hotel dining room. There were present fifty-three ladies and about four times as many men. All the ladies were dressed in handsome ball costumes, and the decollete gown was there in force. The men—or a great many of them—wore the conventional swallow tail broadcloth.

The programme contained all the latest fashionable dances, round and square, and they were executed with an ease and grace that would do credit to St. Louis. A fine Italian orchestra furnished the music and the hotel people gave a spread that was a marvel of completeness. The cards were handsomely embossed, and premiums are being offered for them by people who were not there, to treasure them as souvenirs of the first ball in Creede.—Cor. St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Fought Under Custer.

A very happy family reunion occurred six miles west of Muncie a few days since at the home of Mr. and Mrs. E. R. Russell.

For over thirty years a member of the family has been mourned as dead, but Wednesday he made a happy surprise to his old parents and friends with his presence. Ernest, the oldest son, a lad of sixteen, ran away from home in 1859, going to Minnesota, where he remained until 1862, when he enlisted in the civil war and remained until the close, when he joined the regular army under command of that gallant general, Custer. Nothing was ever heard of the young man until his name was by mistake placed in the list of killed in the great massacre at Little Big Horn.

The young man was severely injured in the fight, but recovered and lives to once more enter his home, where he will remain. Ernest well remembers the famous Indian fight, and relates the horrible spectacle he witnessed in a manner that chills a person's blood.—Cor. Indianapolis Sentinel.

Sunday Is the Proper Word.

At the town meeting in Sharon the much discussed question whether Sunday or Sabbath was the proper term to use was decided and the matter is no longer in doubt. A motion that the constables be authorized to enforce the laws against hunting and fishing on the Sabbath was made, and an amendment was made that the word Sunday should be substituted for Sabbath. This caused a heated discussion of nearly an hour, in which many took part. The amendment was carried by a small majority and the word Sabbath was changed to Sunday, and the motion as amended was carried.—Boston Journal.

Damages for Grief.

A new cause has arisen for a lawsuit. A woman in France was notified by the authorities of a lunatic asylum of her brother's death. She went to the funeral and ordered a handsome tombstone. Her mother was so grieved at her son's death that the plaintiff had to give up her situation to take care of her. Then she learned that the directors of the asylum had made a mistake, and that her brother was alive. After unsuccessful efforts for compensation she has gone to the court, claiming heavy damages for grief and injury.—New York Sun.

An Indignant Burglar.

On a recent morning about 3 o'clock a burglar visited Johnston's drug store, corner of Tenth and O streets, and instead of entering through the regularly provided doorway after ringing the night bell, he climbed over the transom and was about to help himself, when his noise aroused the clerk, who threw his boot at the intruder. "You've got a check to throw your boot at me," was the remark of the burglar, who said "Good night" and departed.—Washington Star.

A Big Job Ahead.

A bureau of press clippings in London has received the royal "command" to furnish twenty distinct sets of newspaper cuttings from every periodical in the world, so far as obtainable, referring to the death of Prince Albert Victor. The sets are to be pasted each in a separate album. The section directed to American clippings should make a very edifying collection, if the bureau is faithful in obeying the command.—New York Sun.

Onto the Bold Counterfeiter.

A letter addressed to Secretary Foster, and dated at Garret, Ind., has just been received, in which the writer states that "there is a man in this part of the country who is manufacturing counterfeit money;" that "he has a machine to print bills, from ones up to twenties, and they look perfect." The writer goes on to say that he will locate the man if it is to his interest.—Washington Cor. Indianapolis Journal.

The Mennonite German colony in Irving Lane county, Or., received an addition of twenty members in one family which arrived there a few weeks ago—mother and father, of middle age, and eighteen robust children. They came from Marion, S. D.

One of the horses belonging to the New York fire department got loose the other night and ascended the stairs to the second floor, and nearly frightened the driver into spasms by playfully poking his cold nose into the latter's face while asleep.

A citizen of Hume, Mo., traded horses with a friend, and was so delighted with his bargain that he led the animal into the house twice for his wife's inspection.

What He Hoped.

Mr. De Brute—My wife has a dog which knows a hundred different tricks. Wouldn't you like to have him?

Showman—Indeed I would. Is he for sale?

"No."

"Won't she sell him at any price?"

"No."

"Then why do you speak to me about him?"

"I was in hopes maybe you would steal him."—Good News.

A Boarding School Supper.

A teacher in a large boarding school for young ladies used to jest over a pupil whose appetite at table caused her neighbors serious alarm. It was the custom to have hot raised biscuits twice a week for supper, and this girl, after eating six one evening, gave her teacher and doctor a very bad night indeed. It never seemed to enter anybody's head that hot yeast biscuit was the food above all others to cause morbid appetite and bilious attacks. Yet the supper of hot biscuits and cheese with honey or preserves is one of the institutions of boarding schools, and worse fare for growing girls it would be hard to find.—Shirley Dare's Letter.

Senses of Taste and Smell.

The incapable, who neither know nor care how food ought to be prepared, are hardly conscious that they are responsible for the health of those they cater to. The senses of taste and smell appear to be interdependent, and everything that tastes pleasantly or smells agreeably excites a flow of the gastric juices, and then, with digestion, there is a better chance to assimilate food.—New York Times.

One of the largest camelia plants ever known is now growing in a nursery near Birmingham, England. It quite fills a large greenhouse. Some 2,000 buds have been trimmed from the tree, and it still has 6,000.

D. 1892, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m., at the Court-room of said Court, to show cause if any they can, why the said real estate should not be leased for the annual rental of $200 00, as more fully set forth in said petition, reference to which is hereby made for further particulars.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published at least two successive weeks in the Inyo Independent, a newspaper of general circulation, printed and published in said Inyo County.

Estate of M. Rojis—Order confirming sale of real estate.

SATURDAY, Dec. 3, 1892.

Estate of Joseph Fernbach—Filed order affirming sale of personal property.

William Rowan is on the way to Los Angeles with a band of horses.

J Scott Broder and James Daley were down from Fish Springs yesterday.

H. M. Yerington and R. J. Laws were at Keeler during the week; they went north to-day.

At home here we don't think of it, but how eastern people would enjoy such lovely weather.

W. B. Hutchings passed through town on Wednesday morning with fifteen head of horses for Los Angeles.

The Supervisors met in special session last Monday evening to arrange for the special election at Cerro Gordo.

Elijah Robinson and F. McIver have been re-appointed Fair Directors by the Governor. Each has already served one term.

Mead's big team left town this morning for Mojave with a cargo of dried hides, grain and other goods. The return cargo will be general merchandise.

It is officially published that anthrax has broken out among cattle in Los Angeles county. The contagion might very readily reach Owens Valley by horses driven here by travelers.

J. W. P. Laird, Esq., left town on Wednesday on his way back to Bakersfield, going by way of Mojave. During his stay of two weeks here he was engaged in professional business.

The late storm was general all over the State. Inyo had less of its effects than any part yet heard from. The rainfall west of the mountains was heavy and the prospect for a good farming season are reported excellent.

R. H. Naunton, special agent for the Commercial Fire Insurance Company was at Independence this week, Mr. Naunton adjusted the losses in the great fire at Independence six years ago, and since then has adjusted losses at Lone Pine.

Mrs. Sarah Collins, wife of A. O. Collins, and her daughters, the Misses Minnie and Leora, and her son, John L. Collins, have made final proof at the Land Office here on a half section of desert land for each of said claimants. The land is located near Warm Spring.

During the past fiscal year 394,000 head of live cattle were shipped from the United States, at an increase in value averaging $8 per head over prices received before. This great gain is due to the system of inspection maintained by the Department of Agriculture, which gives assurance to foreign buyers that none but perfectly healthy cattle are exported.

F. A. Daley Esq., of Madison, Wisconsin is here as the representative of B. J. Stevens, a principal owner in the Stevens canal. He has bought the interest of John McSweeney in the canal and in land below it. Lumber has been ordered for a good house to be built upon the land; fencing and other improvements will be made between now and spring. Mr. McSweeney will have charge of the improvements.

The "Ladies Aid Society," of Lone Pine, have arranged for a Grand Fancy Fair next week, 15th, 16th and 17th. They send a pressing invitation to their friends of Independence and district. There will be a fine collection of useful and ornamental articles on sale. See our new fashioned Orange tree, our Fishpond, etc. A musical and literary program each evening. Mrs. Eibeshutz has kindly consented to perform the opening ceremony on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock. All come and have a good time. Proceeds for proposed new Church.

The Reservation.

A special agent named B. F. Allen came to Independence last Tuesday to examine and report upon the eastern boundary of the proposed reservation in the Sierra Nevada mountains. He stayed here just one night and left next day. So far as known he did not meet or ask a single question of any person having knowledge of the country, nor did he travel over one foot of the proposed reservation. A majority of the committee appointed by Mr. Caminetti to examine and report upon the subject had gone to the Land Office here a few days before Mr. Allen arrived; these men have often explored the mountains and know the country well; this is especially true of Mr. W. L. Hunter, one of the committee. They examined maps at the Land Office and agreed upon what should be the proper boundary of the reservation. This boundary is what Mr. Allen recommends. Just what value to the public are such "investigations and examinations" as made here by this special agent is not easy to see. Mr. Allen is reported to have examined the western boundary of the proposed reservation along the San Joaquin Valley, and to have gone into the mountains some distance last Summer; but this could not qualify him for reporting upon what changes may be necessary to make in the boundary on this side of the mountains.

Indian Burglars.

On Wednesday Constable George L. Drake brought four Indians from Bishop and placed them in the County Jail here. All four are charged with burglary. The complaints transmitted with the accused by Justice Dunlap, of Bishop, charge that on or about October 22d last, said defendants broke into the store of E. W. Fienniken at Bishop and taking goods therefrom. The names of the Indians are Johnie McGee, Jake Duckey, Johnnie Powers and Jamie Moon. All are under twenty years of age and have been attending the Mission School at Bishop. When it was discovered that Duckey was one of the accused his father went to Mr. Fienniken and paid the value of the stolen goods. According to Indian notions this fully satisfied justice and now the old Indian is very indignant about the arrest of his son.

Echo From Iowa.

A few months ago C. M. Persons came from Los Angeles and spent some time in Owens Valley. He afterwards returned to his home in Iowa and the Dodge County Citizen published the following item: "Mr. C. M. Persons has left with us some specimens of California wheat and barley, which cannot be excelled anywhere. It was grown on a 7,000 acre ranch in the fertile Owens Valley of Inyo Co., California, in which Mr. Persons, now visiting in Burnett, has an interest. The yield of wheat there was 37 bushels per acre, and of barley 48 bushels. As barley brings 80 cents and wheat 90 cents there, and land can be bought for $30 an acre, it is certainly a remarkable grain growing region, and must be very profitable." The tract of land alluded to is the Collins place, at Warm Spring.

Ballots All Right.

The following telegram was received this morning.

CERRO GORDO,
December 8th.

INYO INDEPENDENT:

The proclamation from the Governor arrived to-day and was posted, containing an affidavit of one John Thomas, setting forth that the election ballots were lost or destroyed on the 8th day of November. Such is not the case. The ballots, booths and election material were examined to-day by County Clerk, John N. Yandell, and found to be in good shape. More particulars furnished as soon as we can write.

J. DUNPHY, Judge.
P. CLINTON, Inspector.

Nothing For Silver.

It is now thought that the silver conference will be a failure. The men who control gold are opposed to all concessions in favor of silver; and as they also control the money of every nation in Europe they will be allowed to have their way. And yet Rothschild, an English member of the conference, and himself opposed to remonetization of silver, says if something is not done in favor of silver there will be a financial crash that will be felt all over the world.

Christmas Invitation.

The public generally are invited to call at the store of N. Rhine at Independence and examine a large stock of Christmas goods just received. This display makes a handsome show that every one may enjoy free of cost. Owing to interruption of trains Mr. Rhine has not received from San Francisco the supply of invitation cards such as have been sent to patrons in other years; this will explain why cards have not been sent this year.

An Interesting Election.

The special election to be held at Cerro Gordo next Tuesday is an interesting affair. For several county offices the vote at the general election was very close; a few votes would change the result for County Clerk, Coroner and Public Administrator, and one Supervisor. The parties most interested have gone to Cerro Gordo to look after their interests. The whole number of votes to be polled will not exceed eleven.

Grand Jury.

A Grand Jury has been summoned to meet at Independence on the 20th inst. Following is a list of the jurors summoned:

Thos. Williams, Round Valley.
Mark Watterson, Bishop.

CUT YER GRASS, MISSUS.

An Important Washington Summer Industry and How It Is Pursued.

Two half grown colored youths were clipping away vigorously with sickles at a grass bank in front of a Massachusetts avenue mansion in Washington. They had very nearly finished the job when a reporter happened along, and one of them dropped his curved knife to fill a bushel basket with several loads of the cut grass while his companion raked the stuff together and carry them to a cart by the sidewalk. The cart was piled high with the grass dumped into it. After everything had been cleared up in this way the boy who had done the raking rang the house bell and received a silver twenty-five cent piece from the maid who came to the door. It was he also who very willingly gave the newspaper man some information about his business.

"De season fer grass cuttin'," said he, "am from de fust ob May to de fust of October. It is a money makin' business in Washin'ton, sah, whar nearly ebery house has a lawn to it. Most often they're too little to make it wuth while to keep a mower, an' very few folks knows how to use a sickle or to keep it sharp. So there's lots ob men an' boys that earns a good libbin in dis town goin' around an' keepin' de grass cut. Der bes' way am fer two to wuk togedder as pardners, wid a kyart to haul de grass away, sah."

"How much pay do you ask?"

"As much as we think we kin git, sah; but we know pretty nigh onto what folks is willin' to give nearly allus. We go from one house to annuder, whar de grass shows signs ob wantin' to be cut, and at each place we make an offer. S'posin' it's only a little bank as wide as de house, like dat one across de way, we say to de pusson dat comes to de door:

"'Lady, cut yer grass for ten cents.'

"If it's the servant, she sees her missus, and mebbe it's a bargain. S'posin' she says all right, we goes ahead, cuts de grass, collects de money and kyarts de stuff away. Sometimes we make a contrac' wid people to keep deir grass cut fer so much a season. An ole gemmen dat has a lawnmower works wid us when a big place has to be mowed. Some days we earn $3 an' some days $3, an' den de grass am extry."

"What do you do with that?"

"Use it to keep de boss; an' what we don't need we sell. It's de berry finest kind ob grass and fetches a good price. When we git it home we spread it out an' let it dry in de sun fer hay. Oh, yes; dis am a right smart payin' business, sah."—Washington Star.

Explaining a Situation.

It was at a railroad depot in Tennessee. It was a warm, fair day, and the four or five of us who were going to take the train sat on a bench on the shady side of the building. Out on the platform was piled a lot of cotton and to the left of us sat three men, in the center sat two, and three others were on our right. Just why those eight men should sit out there in the sun, each group talking by itself and apparently oblivious to the presence of the others, excited my curiosity, and by and by as a negro drayman backed up after a couple of barrels of salt I asked him to explain.

"I kin tell yo', fur shore," he promptly replied. "Dat crowd on de left is de Bakers—ole man an' two boys. Dat crowd on de right is de Stevenses—ole man an' two boys. Dem air chaps in de center is named Cook an' Parsons."

"But why do they sit there?"

"Dey dun has to, sah."

"But what for?"

"Why, yo' see de Bakers and de Stevenses is inimies, an' dey shoot on sight. Bet yo' life each one of 'em has a gun on his hip!"

"And the others?"

"Dey is sort o' neutral. If a fuss begun dey might hang by de Bakers or they might go ober to the Stevenses. Nobody can't tell. If dey was away dered be some right smart fussin' mighty quick, but dey hole the balance of power, an' as long as dey stay de odder folks won't fuss."

"How long have they been here?"

"Since dis mawnin', sah, but I reckon dere's gwine to be a break up purty soon. Dere goes the Baker crowd now. I reckoned dey'd be the furst to cave in. Wall, dat eands up de fussin' till next time, and it won't be any use fur yo' to hang around heah any longer."—New York Sun.

An Exiled Russian Sculptor.

The Russian sculptor and socialist, Kamenski, who for sixteen years has found a refuge in the United States, attracts attention by the depth of a scar over his right eyebrow. This scar is not connected with some romantic tale of Siberian horror. It is the result of a kick of a Kansas mule. No little surprise was created at the time that it did not cause instant death. It came, however, very near doing so. The sculptor was taken up unconscious, and when his reason returned he was told that he was about to die. In a semi-comatose state he made his last will and awaited the end. Meanwhile over the wires flashed the news of the assassination of the Czar Alexander. A friend who knew Kamenski's principles vowed that he should not die without hearing the news, and, evading the doctor in attendance, she cautiously stole to his bedside and whispered in his ear the fate of the autocrat. The fast chilling blood became warmed and pulsed gleefully through the feeble heart, life was renewed and Kamenski recovered.—Epoch.

Profit in Rare Orchids.

Mr. Harvey, solicitor, of Liverpool, strolling through the houses at St. Albans on July 24, 1882, remarked a plant of lælia anceps, which had the ring mark on its pseudo bulb much higher up than is usual. There might be some meaning in that eccentricity, he thought, paid two guineas for the little thing and on Dec. 21, 1888, sold it back to Mr. Sander for £200. It proved to be lælia anceps amesina, the grandest form of lælia anceps yet discovered, very dark, with a magnificent blotch upon the lip, thus named after F. L. Ames, an American amateur. Such pleasing opportunities might aries for you or me any day.—Longman's Magazine.

What Ailed Her.

At the excursion given the "Little Mothers" the other day a four-year-old baby towed by the big sister was made ill by the ride on the cars. Vomiting was the result.

"You were sick at your stomach, were you not, dear?" said one of the custodians kindly.

"No, I wasn't," explained the wee mite; "my eat was too near my tongue."—New York Recorder.

SHADOW CHILDREN.

When the sun shines then I see
Shadows underneath the tree
Gliding merrily around,
Never making any sound,
Playing at their games, no doubt—
Games I do not know about.

All day long together so
Lightly o'er the ground they go;
Meet and separate and meet,
Scamper down the shadow street;
For an instant here, and then
Just as quickly gone again.

When with clouds the skies are gray
In their house the shadows stay,
With their picture books and toys,
Like all other girls and boys;
But as soon as shines the sun
Out of doors they gladly run.

So for hours they play until
Sinks the sun behind the hill;
Then, like me, they go to bed
In the tree house overhead,
And the winds their cradles swing
To the lullabies they sing.

Frank Dempster Sherman in Harper's Young People.

SYBIL.

Sybil stood still behind the laurel bushes in the garden of the old homestead, which she had inherited with the rest of her large fortune, and her heart turned to ice within her bosom.

A moment before she had been the happiest of beings, sure as she was of the adoration of the man she loved, as only women of her ardent temperament can love. Now she listened to his voice come to her through the glossy laurel leaves, and heard these words:

"I love you, Rose, I love you. I have fought against it, but I have no power to resist my emotions. Why are you so cruel?"

It was to her cousin Rose that Frank Aubury spoke, and Rose answered:

"It is only that you startled me so. I thought you came to see Cousin Sybil. I believe she considers you engaged to her. I have always thought you were."

"Have you?" said Frank Aubury. "Well, I will tell the simple truth; that would have happened if I had not met you. I'm very fond of her yet in a brotherly sort of way, you know. She's awfully good, and her fortune is not to be forgotten. But I worship you; I am as much in love with you as a man can be with a woman. Yes, if you had not come I should have married Sybil. But you did come."

Sybil turned softly away, thinking how much trouble she had taken to coax her cousin Rose to come to visit her in quiet old Parkertown, thinking that it was all her own fault that she had been thrown in Frank Aubury's way.

Frank was very handsome, and Rose had an occupation for her idle hours. She had known that he was Sybil's lover; that if not engaged they understood each other; and she had deliberately gone to work to rob her of his heart. Deliberately. She had seen it, too, and had trusted him. Perfect love had cast out jealousy. She had fancied that Rose might amuse herself without harming her.

"Idiot!" she said to herself. "Ah, we pay as dearly for our folly as for our crimes." And then a stern resolve possessed her. Suffer as she might, no one should know it. She would take the matter into her own hands.

That evening she had a conversation with Frank Aubury which sent him from her with his blood boiling. He was ready to jilt her, but he was not as ready to be jilted. That is quite another thing.

"I've been wrong, I think," she had said, "to let you fancy that I might be won. I have had a fit of remorse about it. I shall never marry a man who cannot give me position. At first I thought you would be able to do that, but you seem content to stay where you are. I like you as a brother, but no more, and we shall be friends, shall we not?"

She acted well, and she made him feel as she desired that he should, and afterward she talked to Rose.

"Do you know why I sent for you?" she said. "I wanted to find a wife for Frank Aubury. He fancied he liked me and I had encouraged him, but it would never do. I am five-and-twenty. I want a man of position. I fancy that I should be unhappy if my husband were not somebody."

"Heaven forgive me for telling such lies," she said in the quiet moments afterward when she was alone with her great agony; "but I have saved my pride."

Rose was married from her cousin's house, and Sybil threw rice after them as they stepped into the carriage, and she was gayest of all the gay party, and her present to the bride was the handsomest; but that night when she bid the last guest adieu she felt that her home was desolate. Parents or sisters she had none; an only brother lived in France and had a large family about him. This beautiful home was hers, and here she had hoped to dwell with her husband, for her fortune was large, and she asked nothing better than to bestow it upon him. Without him it would be as lonely as her life, which seemed empty of all love forever.

For a year she heard nothing of Rose, then a letter came to her asking for a little loan.

"Frank has been speculating," she added—"losing, of course—he always loses—and I haven't a gown to my back."

The money was sent.

More letters followed—more so called loans. Rose never attempted to return them. In each was some complaint of Frank.

A last a more than usually doleful missive came. It began thus:

DEAR SYBIL.—You really are the only friend I have in the world. Frank is so cross that I can't have a man call. He is jealous if I speak a word to an old acquaintance; and as for women, my wardrobe is too empty to make calls or receive them. Such tea gowns as they wear now, too—and that style is so becoming to me! I have a dreadful little baby that does nothing but yell, and no nursemaid. You know on which side your bread was buttered when you shipped Frank off on me—a jealous bear, without sense enough to make a decent income. I do wish I'd never come to pay you that visit. I might have had a man with half a million; he just came into it last week. He had only doubtful expectations when I jilted him, of course. And Frank had expectations, too. They have fizzled out. I'm the most wretched woman alive!

Do send me something out of charity. We have a Vienna roll and an oyster in the house, and no credit and no money.

Oh, I forgot to tell you! Frank broke his leg a week ago. He'd been taking too much drink and had himself brought home. Why he didn't go to an hospital I can't think. Pity poor little me. I have to nurse him and that awful baby, too. Your unfortunate COUSIN ROSE.

In half an hour more Sybil was on her way to her cousin's home. She hardly knew Rose, slovenly, discontented and disheartened as she was. As for Frank, he lay upon a couch, unshaven and unshorn, and cursed his fate.

The rooms were mean, but too expensively furnished; their condition what Rose had described it. And Frank——

Before Sybil had been in the house an hour a great joy possessed her. She breathed deep breaths and smiled as she had not smiled for years, for she made the discovery that her love for Frank was a thing of the dead past; that this sentiment which she had nourished in her bosom in her lonely country home was a sheer folly, born of his handsome face and winning ways. In this uncomfortable home his true character came out quite plainly.

Sybil felt a great pity for the little crushed butterfly who winced at these taunts; but she had money, and was able to make matters better at once. She began with a good dinner, and before long Rose had a perfect wardrobe—the baby all it needed. Frank, in a charming cashmere dressing gown, with the attention of a hair dresser, was handsome once more, and was good enough to call Sybil their guardian angel.

A little girl was hired to assist in the care of the poor baby, and Rose, in her new dress, was perpetually going out to call, to walk, to shop. Sybil kept her purse full, and Frank besought his cousin to stay—to read to him, to sing to him. They had a little upright piano which Rose never touched.

She did all he asked, and every hour deepened her thankfulness that she was not his wife, and added to her disgust for his contemptible character.

Moreover, she exerted herself among some friends she had, and obtained for her cousin's husband a position which he could fill as soon as his health permitted.

She was very anxious to return home—anxious to begin to be happy again, as she could not be where these two unfortunate people quarreled perpetually; but she resolved not to leave them until her duty was done.

Of the climax that approached she did not guess. It came like a thunder clap.

One day as she was sitting near the window with the baby in her lap—Rose staying unusually long abroad that day—a messenger boy brought a note to the door. He gave it to Frank, who opened it, read it and uttered a furious oath.

"Read it," he said.

Sybil caught the paper that he flung toward her. It bore these words:

I am off. I don't go alone. There are people who think me as charming as ever. I shall be in Europe, and living where you can't find me before you are able to hobble about. How horridly you have used me! How I detest you! I hope I shall never see your face again! Tell dear Sybil that if she wants to be an angel and be carried straight to heaven she will take care of my miserable little baby. She can afford it, and it may grow up decent if she does in spite of being our child. I had to take the money she put in the drawer for the landlady. I needed—absolutely needed—a traveling wrap. Good-by, forever. Thank goodness!

ROSE.

"And I am not able to follow her to kill them both," gasped Frank. "Oh, my God!" and he wept with rage and shame.

Knowing all she knew, Sybil found it hard to pity him.

Still when afterward he asked her if she would take the child under her care she said "yes" for the baby's sake.

* * * * * * *

Two years after this Frank Aubury went slowly up the path that led to that pretty homestead on the hill, where behind the laurels Sybil had listened to his words to her cousin Rose. That was not yet five years ago, but ten should not have changed him so. He was thin and worn and limped a little, and his skin was gray, and the look of a man who was dissatisfied with life was in his eyes. He thought how comfortable all this was as he entered the broad, well furnished hall, and was shown into the wide parlor in which Sybil sat reading to a pretty little girl.

Sybil handsomer than he ever thought she could be.

"My poor girl, I suppose," he said, looking at the child after Sybil had given him her hand.

"Kiss your father, my dear. That is the proper thing, I suppose;" but the child was shy and ran out of the room calling to her nurse.

"I deserve it," said he. "I never even named her. What do you call her?"

"Frank," said Sybil; "Frances she was christened."

"I'm glad it was not Rose," said he. "Rose is dead, Sybil. She sent for me to come to her. She died in a hospital—a mere wreck."

There was silence; then he said:

"Sybil, you were my first love, and I have never ceased to love you. Rose bewitched me, but I repented before our honeymoon was over. Sybil, I love you still. Can't you let the past die out of memory? I—I'm not so bad a fellow as you think."

Sybil looked at him gravely.

"Stop!" she said. "Long ago when you had made love to me very ardently I came to like you. I heard you talking to Rose behind the laurels, and I took my love by the throat and strangled it; and now—look—this is my engagement ring. I am to be married to-morrow to one I not only love, but esteem, and all memory of the past sorrow is blotted out. You did not make my poor cousin happy, Frank; you drove her to her fate. She saved me from much sorrow when she, as you say, bewitched you."

There was a pause.

"I hope you are getting on well," Sybil said, after a while.

"Oh, yes," he answered, "if drudgery for bread and butter fills the bill." Then he arose. "Good-by," he said.

They did not shake hands this time, and neither Sybil nor his little girl ever saw Frank Aubury again.—Toronto Mail.

False Philanthropy.

It is one of the strange inconsistencies of human nature that men prefer to do good through the medium of benevolence rather than through that of justice. It is not uncommon to find the seller exerting every energy to get more than a fair price for his goods, and the buyer putting forth equal efforts to obtain them for less than their true value, and yet both subsequently uniting to found some charitable institution, to uphold a church, to promote a reform, to relieve distress.

There are men who will grind the faces of the poor in the morning in their business and in the afternoon subscribe a good round sum to provide them with food and shelter. There are women, both wealthy and of moderate means, who will drive a sharp and hard bargain and will give only the smallest possible sum to those whom they employ to work for them, yet who will willingly give far more than they thus save when a tale of distress arouses their sympathies and excites their pity. Schemes of philanthropy cannot atone for acts of injustice.—New York Ledger.

A Famous Sculptor of Italy.

Professor Pio Fedi died at the age of seventy-six. He suffered for several years from paralysis. He was one of the best modern sculptors of Italy, an imitator of Canova and a follower of the Greek school. Some of his best statues are at the Loggia del Arcagno, at the Uffizi and the Old Palace. One of his "Christs" adorns the upper part of the Scala Santa at Rome. From every part of Italy telegrams of sympathy have arrived. His funeral was very grand. All those who belong to the Academy of Art and all the notabilities of the town followed his body; innumerable garlands and bouquets covered the funeral car.—Florence Cor. Galignani Messenger.

Chinese Surgery.

Like most things in China, the practice of surgery differs considerably from that in vogue in less enlightened western countries. Bone setting in the Celestial empire is a complicated affair, and doubtless much more efficacious than European methods. In setting a fractured limb the surgeon does not attempt to bring the bones together, but merely wraps the limb in red clay, inserting some strips of bamboo into the clay. These strips are swathed in bandages, and in the outer bandage the head of a live chicken is placed. Here comes in the superior science of the Celestial. After the bandage has been secured the fowl is beheaded and its blood is allowed to penetrate the fracture, for it nourishes the fractured limb and is "heap good medicine."—London Hospital.

THE HERCULES.

In placing the Hercules Gas or Gasoline Engine in the field in competition with other gas engines, we do so with the utmost confidence that we are "in it." Our system of operating this engine is so far ahead of all others that it needs but an introduction in any community to insure an immense sale. A woman can handle it. It requires no engineer. It can be started in an instant. No electric spark to get out of order. It oils itself. It beats all others. Write Palmer & Rey, 405-407 Sansome St., San Francisco for particulars. The price and capability will surprise you.

For Simplicity it Beats the World. It has Fewer Parts, and is therefore less likely to get out of order than any other Gas Engine now built.

Daily Newspaper and Job Office.

We have used your four horse-power "Hercules" Gas Engine for nearly two months now, and have not yet failed to get our edition off on time; on the contrary, we find it the best investment we could have made. For convenience it cannot be beat. Unlike the steam engine it is clean, no coal to shovel into a furnace, no fires to get up, no water to watch to keep the boiler from going through the roof—indeed it is simple and economical in all respects, and we feel that in changing from steam to gas we have secured a donation of $100 per year to the office, independent of all other considerations, and that means that $100 is the difference in the cost of fuel per year between steam-power and gas power. Thanking you for past favors, including the great service done by you in putting an engine like the "Hercules" on the market, we are,

Yours truly, PENNYCOOK & HARRIER,

A Leading San Jose Printer Says.

The two horse-power "Hercules" Engine bought last December, more than fulfils every promise you made for it. Am running two jobbers and a Cottrell Cylinder with it, and I am satisfied it would run as much more machinery with ease. I have not had the least trouble with it, and I can cheerfully recommend your engine to any one desiring a reliable and economical power. Have had considerable experience with other makes of gas engines, and do not hesitate to say that the "Hercules" beats them all. The hollow "tube" is a great improvement over the unreliable "spark," and what especially pleases me is that your engine developes more power than you claim for it—something that cannot be said of any other make of gas engine coming under my notice. I never bought a piece of machinery that has given me the satisfaction your engine has.

Printers Pleased With It.

We beg leave to report to you on the success of one of your "Hercules" Gas Engines which is now in operation in our office. It is a one horse-power, and readily runs a large power press, and a jobber at the same time, and is then not working up to its full capacity. We have had no trouble whatever with the engine, and for neatnes, convenience and power we consider it the best in the field. We are delighted with it, and with the experience had with it, and can heartily recommend the "Hercules" Engine to anyone. Truly yours,

GENTLEMEN:—I believe I have now given your Gasoline Engine a fair test, and am ready to say that it answers satisfactorily to all you claim for it. It is easily started, steady in action, sufficiently powerful, and cheap in cost of running. I use gasoline gas in running it. It has increased my output of soda water 1,000 dozen per day.

SAFE AND EFFECTIVE.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are the safest and most effective remedy for indigestion, Irregularity of the Bowels, Constipation, Biliousness, Headache, Dizziness, Malaria, or any disease arising from an impure state of the blood. They have been in use in this country for over fifty years, and the thousands of unimpeachable testimonials from those who have used them, and their constantly increasing sale, is incontrovertible evidence that they perform all that is claimed for them. Sold in every drug and medicine store, either plain or sugar coated.

VILE AND UNWORTHY

Of consideration are nostrums of which it is asserted—and there are many such—that they cure immediately bodily ailments of long standing. There are none such that can. Chronic disorders cannot be instantaneously removed. Continuity in the use of genuine medicine, such as Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, will eradicate chronic physical evils. Not the least of these last in the force of its opposition to medicine is constipation, to the removal of which, if persisted in, the Bitters is particularly adapted. Constriction of the bowels is a complaint which should be dealt with early and systematically. So are its usual attendants, liver complaint and dyspepsia. For these, for malaria, rheumatism, kidney trouble, and more recently "la grippe," this highly and professionally commended medicine is an undoubted specific. Nothing can exceed it, moreover, as a means of imparting strength to the feeble and nervous.

DEAFNESS CAN'T BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that we cannot cure by taking Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

AT THE FIRESIDE.

Pile on the logs! the bright flames start,
And up the roaring chimney race;
How grateful should we be, sweetheart,
For just this little fireplace!

I said today that I was poor,
And poor in some things I may be;
But here's a shelter—who needs more?—
And two bright eyes to shine for me.

No sculptured busts, no paintings rare,
Crowd the plain mantel and the shelf;
God made the only picture here,
And that sweet picture is—yourself.

No record old of ancient lore
Strange wisdom to the place imparts;
In love's consent we ask no more
Than just to read each other's hearts.

We have no idle dreams of fame,
And all our worldly wants are few;
What care I for a laureled name
When I've the dearest name in you?

Lean, golden head, upon my breast
In wealth of wondrous beauty which
Hath crowned my life and made me blest;
And kiss me, dear, and make me rich.

MARGUERITE BRAIDS.

The bright morning sunlight shot quivering little shafts of light through the tangled vines that shaded the wide, cool piazza that ran along the side of Judge Bradford's luxurious country house, and cast fantastic shadows over the young girl seated in a low rocker busily engaged in sewing on a peasant's costume for a fancy dress ball.

A wonderfully pretty picture did this industrious little seamstress make as she sat in her leafy bower this perfect June day. Her complexion was the clear pearly white, softly tinted, so often seen in New England's daughters, her features were delicate and regular, with a mouth of sensitive sweetness, as expressive of every emotion as her large violet blue eyes, that shaded from deepest azure almost to purple; but her greatest beauty, her crowning glory, was her hair. It was not merely blonde hair, flaxen or yellow, but it was a pure golden tint that shone in each glittering thread like burnished gold. It waved in thick silken masses off from her broad, low forehead, and was gathered at the back of her shapely little head in two great satin smooth braids that fell to her very knees.

Her figure as it bent over the swing was tall, slender and graceful in every curve and line, and she was as unconscious of her own beauty as she was that there was any merit in the laborious, self denying life she led.

Beth Thornton's father had been a retired naval officer, whose half pay had barely sufficed to support himself and his wife and child without having any surplus for the inevitable "rainy day." The year before our story opens he had died, and with him his slender income, leaving his wife and daughter penniless, save for the tiny cottage in which they lived.

About this time Mrs. Thornton's sight began to fail her, with the awful prospect of losing it entirely without she submitted to a delicate and costly operation.

This double calamity was a hard blow to poor little Beth, then scarcely 18. Worst of all was the knowledge that the terrible misfortune which threatened her mother might be averted if only she possessed the money to pay for the services of a skilled oculist, a sum that appeared almost hopeless for her to raise by her own exertions.

But Beth was a sensible little girl, who knew that tears and repinings would not remedy matters or keep the wolf from the door, so she bravely set herself to work. All of her own girlish hopes and aspirations were resolutely put to one side, and not being able to find more congenial employment in the sleepy Berkshire village where she lived she began her battle of existence as a seamstress.

It was something of a trial and a humiliation to her proud spirit to work as a servant in families where she had formerly visited as an honored guest, but like the noble, truehearted girl that she was, Beth went about her duties cheerfully and uncomplainingly, and tried bravely to stifle all rebellious thoughts and regrets.

Usually she was very successful in her efforts to keep down the unhappy memories, but this glorious June morning as she sat diligently sewing on Edith Bradford's Marguerite costume for the grand masquerade ball at the Courtenays' they arose and triumphed over her. A little sigh escaped her as she thought how hard it was that she must be shut out from all such pleasures and gayeties so dear to a young girl's heart.

"There's lots of good times in the world, only I ain't in 'em," Beth quoted with a tremulous little smile, and she leaned her head far back so that the tears, which had rushed to her eyes at the doleful words of poor Glory MacQuirk, should not fall on the delicate fabric in her lap and spot it.

And as she sat thus with her head raised, her eyes—from which she had dashed the pearly drops—wandered across the valley to where the gray stone turrets and gables of Bucheroft, Philip Courtenay's magnificent home, rose in stately grandeur above the lofty tree tops.

Beth had received an invitation to Mrs. Courtenay's masquerade ball, which was to be given in honor of her son's return from Europe, where he had been for the past ten years completing his education by study and travel. It was not often that she cared about going to the neighborhood parties to which she had invitations, even had it been possible for her to have done so, but this one she did long to attend most earnestly.

Could it be on account of handsome Phil Courtenay? Beth asked herself in sudden terror. And the thought made her pulses throb, as somehow he had made them do more than once during these past few weeks since his return—and he Edith Bradford's lover!

Just at that moment Miss Bradford herself came up the piazza steps, looking so fair and elegant in her pearl gray tailor made walking suit and her jaunty English toque, with the blue plume curling over her golden hair, which was the exact shade of Beth's long plaits.

"Isn't it too provoking?" she cried, a little frown of impatient displeasure in her pretty face, as she sank down in a willow rocker beside Beth. "Even Gaillard cannot match my hair for those Marguerite braids! What on earth shall I do about it? Give up my character or stay at home?"

Beth was instantly relieved of the sharp little touch of pain the recollection of Phil Courtenay had given her by the sound of Edith's voice.

"I should not let such a little thing as the want of a plait or two of false hair keep me at home from Mrs. Courtenay's masquerade if I at all wanted to go," Beth said, quietly; "but then, you know, I wouldn't want to go anyhow."

"You honest little Puritan! But, then, you are so different from any other girl that ever lived. I should think you would literally stagnate going about the way you do and drudging for everybody. By the way, as you are so soon to leave here, I want your private opinion—mind, Beth, your very, most heartfelt opinion—about Philip—the one only man I ever saw whom I loved."

Her heartfelt opinion! The unconscious sarcasm pierced her to the heart, and it was alarmingly near her quivering lips, averted from Edith's eyes, to say that he was the one only man she, too, had ever loved or would ever love. Instead she answered quietly:

"Mr. Courtney ought to make you a blessed woman, Miss Bradford."

"And it is to be hoped he will," Edith laughed. "You have seen yourself what a devoted friend he is, Beth. He is splendid, isn't he? And rich! Well, papa's fortune is an insignificant one beside Philip Courtenay's. Yes, his wife will be a blessed woman, Beth."

Such a sick, faint pain was tugging at the girl's heart, yet she was so brave, so game, that little country girl, all untutored in the ways of the world.

"But about my hair," said Edith irrelevantly. "Unless I can match it so as to wear it in two long plaits down my back a la Marguerite—you know I have so little hair of my own—I shall certainly not go to Bucheroft, and then"——

Beth looked up inquiringly.

"Then what?"

"Mr. Courtenay will be so disappointed, because, you see, he is a great admirer of a beautiful head of hair. He was the one who first suggested the idea to me of going in the character of Marguerite. It was the other afternoon when he was calling here, and as you left the room he spoke about your magnificent plaits and said you were an ideal Marguerite. Then he asked me why I didn't wear my hair like yours. Of course men know nothing about the fashion, but I promised him I would go to the ball with my hair in braids, and also prevail on you to accompany me at his urgent request. Aren't you flattered?"

A sudden agitation sprang to Beth's face—swift, vivid flash she could not restrain—and then came a quick, new lightness to her sweet blue eyes.

Philip had requested she should go!

How sweet it was! How her girlish heart throbbed with the new thought! Then she smiled and shook her head in such a matter of fact way that Edith never could have guessed, in a thousand chances, the storm of emotion that had rolled over her.

"Mr. Courtenay is very kind and thoughtful; but you know I have had no intention whatever of going. I would like to go; but"——

"Yes, I understand—the 'old, old story,' that Miss McFlimsey can sing so well. That should not stand in your way, Beth; because, if my memory serves me right, you have a pale green crepe that you got before your father died. It would do admirably for Urlpine, and with your magnificent golden hair floating loose over your shoulders, you would look the character to the life."

A little ecstatic delight showed on Beth's face as she cried, eagerly:

"I do believe I could wear it, and I am afraid I do want to go!"

And just that very minute, for the first time, it occurred to Miss Bradford that perhaps the attraction for Ruth Thornton was—Philip Courtenay!

A look of jealous anger darkened on her handsome face; then a companion feeling of hard, jealous fury filled her heart, as she remembered, as by a revelation, a dozen little admiring words Beth had said of him, a dozen little looks she had seen Mr. Courtenay give Beth, and a dozen commendatory things he had said of her and especially of her wonderful hair.

Edith's cold blue eyes rested on the great burnished plaits hanging over Beth's shoulders until their curling silken ends swept the floor, with an expression of bitter hatred and envy. The thought suddenly occurred to her how gladly she would put shears to that crown of glory and crop it close to the graceful head, and with the thought a cruel plan entered her brain whereby he might destroy this girl's greatest beauty and further her own selfish desires at the same time.

"Unless you are conscientiously opposed, dear," she remarked, softly dropping her long lashes to hide the look of wicked exultation in her eyes, "what I want to say is that if you are willing to stay at home I have a proposition to make which may suit your tender little conscience. Let me cut off your long braids, Beth, and I will give you a hundred dollars for them, which will be certainly of more practical benefit in helping to restore your mother's eyesight than the possession of such a mop of hair. I can fasten the plaits to a comb under the peasant cap I wear, and as they match my hair perfectly no one will know but what they grew on my own head. There's a plan for you to accept or reject!"

Edith raised her white lids to watch the changes in Beth's sweet, mobile face—changes she saw, but was not sure she could translate.

While Beth sat there, with great thrills of keen, sharp agony at thought of losing her woman's crown, of yearning desire to go where "he" would be, where he would see and admire her glorious wealth of golden tresses—then, pitiful qualms of conscience stricken pain, that she was so weak and selfish as to hesitate a second time between her vanity and the almost certainty of giving back to her poor mother the blessing of sight; then one brief struggle, then victory.

"Certainly, you can have my hair," she faltered bravely, with a pitiful white face, "and thank you a thousand times for your generosity."

Her generosity! Miss Bradford's conscience gave her a tweak of sharp remembrance, as though it had said—her supreme, heartless, cruel, treacherous selfishness.

But her end was accomplished and that was all she desired. Beth would no longer be a dangerous rival after she was shorn of her crowning beauty.

"Shall I have the village barber cut my hair when I go home this evening?" Beth asked after a pause, in which she had subdued a suspicious lump in her throat.

"Dear me, no!" cried Edith, starting hastily to her feet. "He would be sure to ruin it with his bungling. If you will come up to my dressing room, Beth, I will cut it myself."

Without a word Beth rose and followed Miss Bradford up the stairs, striving valiantly to keep back the tears which would well up in her sweet blue eyes at thought of the coming sacrifice.

"Sit down in that low chair by the window," Edith commanded briskly, "while I get a pair of scissors from my work basket."

The thick, curling ends of Beth's glossy plaits touched the floor as she sank into the designated seat and bowed her golden head to the cruel blades.

Edith's cold, blue eyes shone with malicious satisfaction as she grasped one of the thick plaits and thrust the slim blades into the silken locks underneath. She sheared it off close to the scalp and tossed it on to the toilet table at her side. She smiled grimly as she turned and seized the other plait, cropping it off with a savage, grinding snip, and another and another. This was placed beside its several mates, and then she paused to survey her work. The long woven locks in front broke naturally into a mass of shining curls altogether too pretty and bewitching, Miss Bradford decided, and so the merciless scissors were again applied, and the thick curls fell in a silken mass to the floor, leaving Beth's wretched little head as close cropped as a convict's.

"You will probably have to wear a close cap for a few weeks until your hair grows out a little," Edith remarked coolly, as she counted out to Beth her hard earned money. "You look rather odd just at present, but it will be a great convenience for you not to have such a mop of hair to take care of."

Beth was too faint and dizzy from the loss of her heavy fleece to make reply, and crept back to her sewing, with the $100 tucked safely away in her shabby little portmonnaie, to ease her aching heart.

When the evening of the masquerade came Beth helped to arrange her severed braids, smooth and shining as golden satin, on Miss Bradford's head, making complete the exquisite Marguerite costume. Then she returned to her humble cottage home and cuddled up in a big chair in the cozy little parlor, and first cried softly at it all, then very bravely and sensibly decided to thoroughly enjoy her sacrifice, and to put away from her all thought of Philip Courtenay's bold, handsome eyes.

While that gentleman, securely disguised in his magnificent costume of "Sir Launcelot," was making his way toward a tall, graceful Marguerite, whose long, glittering plaits he was sure never grew on any other head than that of sweet, gentle Beth Thornton, what was his surprise as he drew nearer to hear a fragment of conversation between the supposed Beth and a saucy looking soubrette in red slippers and gay ribbons.

"Aren't the braids magnificent?" came from Marguerite, but in a voice which he instantly recognized as Edith Bradford's. "And you'd never guess where in the world they came from either, Nina. Just fancy! I cut them from the head of Beth Thornton, the village seamstress, who has been making my costume. I was determined to appear tonight as Marguerite, and as I haven't enough hair of my own to make decent looking braids, I tried to match it in Boston, but failed—none of the hair dressers had anything near it in color. Fortunately Beth's locks were the very same shade as mine, and as I happened to know that she was very anxious to raise enough money to have her mother's eyes operated on, I offered her a good round price for her crowning glory. She preferred her mother's eyesight to her own beauty, consequently she is at home with a close cropped head, and I am here with her plaits."

The little red slippered girl vented ecstacies.

"They are superb, Edith! Mr. Courtenay's heart will be tangled in their silken meshes, for of course he will never imagine but what they are all your own. Honor bright—tell me, aren't you two engaged or is it all?——

"That was all Mr. Courtenay dared—all he wanted to hear, for it is story of Beth Thornton's noble sacrifice had opened his eyes to the fact that she was the dearest girl in all the world for him. Therefore, while Edith Bradford was flaunting her Marguerite braids proudly, and watching with painful anxiety the coming of her knight, that gentleman was sitting in the parlor of Mrs. Thornton's modest cottage, with feathered chapeau doffed at Beth's feet, and all his eager passion in his handsome eyes as he told her how he loved her, more than ever for her noble sacrifice, and pleaded well with her to give her sweet self to him for ever and aye.

And Beth, hushed and dazed with the exquisite surprise of happiness, could only look her responsive love from shy, sweet eyes that told the story of her heart.

And Edith Bradford wonders, with not a little quiver of jealous pain, how ever it happened that Philip Courtenay, such an admirer of female beauty and luxuriant tresses, in particular, ever came to fall in love with Beth Thornton after she had given her such a prison crop.—C. F. B. in Buffalo Evening News.

Love Making on the Rail.

The car was filled with excursionists returning from the exposition. Every seat contained a pair of Buckeye lovers. The last bear died in Ohio some time ago, but the art of hugging has survived. It was the midnight express and the air was right chilly, but not a soul noticed that except a poor little married man who sat alone in the half seat by the unlighted stove. He looked down the car and noticed that apparently all the young men were one armed; at least, but one arm of each man was visible. The light in the car was very low, however, and that may account for the phenomenon.

Lovers like twilight. If Adam and Eve did not sing "In the Gloaming" it was because they knew a fresher song. And it was twilight in that car, for all three double lamps were turned down very low, and, before the train was out of the Alleghany yards, the flame in one of them had sputtered, fired a moment and expired. Of course, every girl in the car was alarmed when the gloom deepened. Every girl got a little closer to her protector, and a few minutes later, when the second began to show signs of collapse—the flame leaping up frantically, as if afraid to die—about a dozen pianissimo screams came from as many feminine throats.

The conductor opened the door a few minutes later and the draught finished lamp number two. This left one lamp alight at the rear end of the car. How anxiously it was observed! Would it go out? It looked consumptive, but there was no draught to expedite its decease. At last the train whistled for the first stop, and the little married man came out of his corner by the stove to alight. He had been a bachelor once, and he remembered it as he laid his hand on the door knob. The train had not stopped, but he opened the door and immediately a gust of wind murdered the last lamp. As he stood in the doorway inhaling cinders and river fog, he had the satisfaction of hearing a sweet, low voice murmur behind him: "Oh, George, I was so afraid!"

"Of what, my darling?"

"That that lamp would never go out!"—Pittsburg Dispatch.

A Definition.

Clubley—When a man is cut dead, don't you know, how—ah—would you—ah—define it?

Old Blase—Something like this, chappie: A cut is the method employed by one person of uncertain social position to wound another person of uncertain social position. Such a one feels that he is mistaken for a gently bred person only when he is in the company of his superiors, and therefore he is wise enough to know that he can't afford to speak to his equals.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

THE EVENING PRIMROSE.

Sad Evening Primrose, with your silken stole
Hung delicately sunward, what a soul
Looks from your patient eye! How frail and pale
You stand among the flowerets! and your bowl
Shows like a vanishing phantom of the grail.

Young buds that point a finger to the blue
Crowd on your stem, and youth and hope are new,
While the sap runs; yet scarcely has the sun
Warmed twice upon your petals ere their hue
Falls into palidness of death begun.

And strewn about the grass the blossoms hide
The poor discolored fragments of their pride,
Or hang disconsolate with draggled vest,
And clinging, sodden cerements, to abide
The gradual workings of the Alkahest.

Was it for this you struggled into light?
That one brief day should crown a tedious night?
Was it for this you felt your way along
The paths of natural growth, that from their height
Shrill death should echo in your triumph song?

It may be so. There are who say the bliss
Requites the pain; yet could it be for this (God knows) you opened your sweet, patient eyes
To see the sun's face once and die in his kiss?
For me—you bloom again in Paradise.

Names and Businesses.

There is at times a peculiar coincidence as regards the name of a man and his business. Such an appropriateness of name to calling is frequently quite accidental. "Sexton Brothers, Undertakers and Upholsterers," is the wording of a sign at Long Branch, and a dressmaker on Clinton street, New York, bears the name of N. Nadel (the German for needle). To those who understand German, Schneider will seem an equally appropriate name for a dressmaker, and there are plenty of butchers in town named Metzger, while at least one barber glories in the name of Scheerer. But it seems odd that a Baecker should deal in meat, or that even an Avenue A. Barber should sell beer.

However, when we hear of "Taylor & Cutter," a firm of clothiers, or find that "Stickwell & Co." are mucilage makers there is a strong suspicion of an intentional manufacture of appropriate firm names. And that story about the broker firm of "U. Ketcham & I. Cheatham" has been told so often that one hardly knows whether to credit it or not.—New York Times.

Centralization of Government.

The history of the federal government is one of growing strength and influence. The difference between the intention of the founders of the system and of the existing fact is nearly as great as that between the opinions of Jefferson and moderate Federalists. From the first organization of the government to the present time there has been almost a steady advance toward centralization. This advance has been both aided and retarded by the supreme court; but in the legislative branch of the government and in the popular mind the proportions of the federal government have constantly grown larger. It has not been the tendency of the people of the republic to strengthen the local government at the expense of the general government. On the contrary, the general government has grown at the cost of the states.—Henry L. Nelson in Harper's.

The Nepalese "Kora."

The Nepalese "kukri", or heavy curved knife, with the edge on the inner side, is familiar by name to readers of the accounts of our "little wars," in which the Ghoorka infantry have taken part. But there is another Nepalese weapon, the "kora," the most strangely shaped sword ever used, which, starting from the hilt about an inch and a half wide, when near the end turns at right angles and expands to six inches. The late Jung Bahadur, a noted expert at all eastern arms and exercises, was able to decapitate a bullock with one blow of the kora.—Chambers' Journal.

Carvings on Easter Island.

The hard volcanic rock of Easter island is covered with carvings intended to represent human faces, birds, fishes and mythical animals. Fishes and turtles appear common among these sculptures, but the most common figure is a mythical animal, half human in form, with bowed back and long, clawlike legs and arms. According to the natives this symbol was intended to represent the god "Meke-Meke," the great spirit of the sea.—Philadelphia Ledger.

They All Dodged.

A quaint minister once said, "Now, brethren, I propose to throw this hymn book at the man who has been thinking of something other than the sermon."

How One Knows.

A wedding came off at Tyrone at the unusual hour of 6:45 in the morning. It is unnecessary to add that this was the wedding of a railroad man. Any other kind of a man selecting the same time would have been married at a quarter of 7 o'clock—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Walled Cities in India and China.

The first glimpse we get of an eastern walled city unfolds at once memories of our childhood days, which have perhaps never been awakened since, and the pictures of our childish books, which impressed themselves so vividly upon our minds, are reproduced in the bright colors of old, when we are brought face to face with the quaint battlements and the dark gateways, with the accessories of bright, burning sunshine and turbaned figures and processions of camels and the listless calm of the tropical land. Such old cities are still to be seen in India, still walled in the old fashion and still peopled by the figures of the Biblical picture book.

Closely akin to them are those walled towns standing on the canals of mid-China, passing through which, say at the close of day, when every tower and every roof stands out clearly cut against the brilliant western sky and we are challenged by a grotesque figure, armed with a spear and probably wearing armor, the illusion is complete, and for the moment we find it hard to realize that we are traveling at the end of the Nineteenth century.

Even in much changed Japan there are old cities which still retain their walls of the age of feudalism, and in the very heart of the capital the imperial palace is surrounded by the same quaint fortifications which in old troublous times made it an imperium in imperio, although the walls are crumbling and the gates are never shut, and the moats have been abandoned to the lotus and to carp of monstrous size and fabulous age.—Cor. Chicago Herald.

The Azores.

In 1580 the Azores came under the power of Spain, and in the history of the next twenty years their name is frequent as the favorite battleground of the English and Spanish fleets. The partiality was, indeed, mainly on the side of the former, and for a good reason. These islands lay right in the track of all vessels sailing to and from that enchanted region known then to all men as the Spanish Main. On the highest peak of Terceira, whence in clear weather the sea could be scanned for leagues around, were raised two columns, and by them a man watched night and day. When he saw any sails approaching from the west he set a flag upon the western column, one for each sail; if they came from the east a similar sign was set up on the eastern column.

Hither in those days came up out of the mysterious western seas the great argosies laden with gold and silver and jewels, with silks and spices and rare woods, wrung at the cost of thousands of harmless lives and cruelties unspeakable from the fair lands which lie between the waters of the Caribbean sea and the giant wall of the Andes. And hither, when England too began to turn her eyes to El Dorado, came the great war galleons of Spain and Portugal to meet these precious cargoes and convoy them safe into Lisbon or Cadiz before those terrible English sea wolves could get scent of the prize.—Macmillan's Magazine.

Important Advice.

A gentleman who believed that to an important extent clothes made the man, even when the man is a royal personage, visited the Comte de Chambord at Frosdorf a few years ago. The Comte de Chambord was the grandson of Charles X, the last Bourbon king of France, and the French Royalists called him Henri V, and hoped, until his death, in 1883, to restore him to the throne. The marquis, of whom this story is told, was a Parisian, a man of fashion and an ardent Royalist. The Comte de Chambord was glad of an opportunity to talk over political affairs with a man who must know what was going on in Paris; so after a few minutes' chat he said: "Marquis, it is not often that I have a chance to talk with any one so well informed on the signs of the times in Paris as yourself. Now in case I return to Paris what would you advise me to do?"

He waited for a bit of profound political philosophy. The marquis looked at "Henri the Fifth" and hesitated. Should he venture on a great liberty? But his advice had been asked; as a loyal subject he would give it frankly. "Sire—monseigneur," he stammered, "I think you had better give up your German tailor and have your trousers made in Paris." "My trousers!" "Yes, sire; pardon me, but your trousers are out of fashion."—San Francisco Argonaut.

Strange Effects of Extreme Cold.

Dr. Moss, of the English polar expedition of 1875-7, among many other things, tells of the strange effects of the extreme cold upon the candles they burned. The temperature was from 35 to 50 degs. below zero, and the doctor says he was considerably discouraged when upon looking at his candle he discovered that the flame "had all it could do to keep warm." It was so cold that the flame could not melt all of the tallow of the candle, but was forced to eat its way down, leaving a sort of skeleton candle standing. There was heat enough, however, to melt odd shaped holes in the thin walls of tallow, the result being a beautiful lacelike cylinder of white with a narrow tongue of yellow flame burning on the inside and sending out many streaks of light into the darkness.—St. Louis Republic.

THE AGE OF PAPER.

The Time Is Coming When Paper Will Be the Only Useful Thing.

The world has seen its iron age and its brazen age, but this is the age of paper. We are making so many things of paper that it will soon be true that without paper there is nothing made. We live in paper houses, wear paper clothing, and sit on paper cushions in paper cars rolling on paper wheels. If we lived in Bergen, Norway, we could go on Sundays to a paper church.

We do a paper business over paper counters, buying paper goods, paying for them with paper money, and deal in paper stocks on paper margins. We row races in paper boats for paper prizes. We go to paper theaters where paper actors play to paper audiences.

As the age develops the coming man will become more deeply enmeshed in the paper net. He will awake in the morning and creep from under the paper clothing of his paper bed and put on his paper dressing gown and his paper slippers. He will walk over paper carpets, down paper stairs, and seating himself in a paper chair will read the paper news in the morning paper. A paper bell will call him to his breakfast, cooked in a paper oven, served on paper dishes, laid on a paper cloth on a paper table. He will wipe his lips with a paper napkin, and having put on his paper shoes, paper hat and paper coat, and then taking his paper stick (he has the choice of two descriptions already), he will walk on a paper pavement or ride in a paper carriage to his paper office. He will organize paper enterprises and make paper profits.

He will sail the ocean on paper steamships and navigate the air in paper balloons. He will smoke a paper cigar or paper tobacco in a paper pipe, lighted with a paper match. He will write with a paper pencil, whittle paper sticks with a paper knife, go fishing with a paper fishing rod, a paper line and a paper hook, and put his catch in a paper basket. He will go shooting with a paper gun, loaded with paper cartridges, and will defend his country in paper forts with paper cannon and paper bombs. Having lived his paper life and achieved a paper fame and paper wealth, he will retire to paper leisure and die in paper peace. There will be a paper funeral, at which the mourners, dressed in paper crape, will wipe their eyes with paper handkerchiefs, and the preacher will preach in a paper pulpit. He will lie in a paper coffin; he has a chance of doing so already if he is a paper—we mean pauper. He will be wrapped in a paper shroud, his name will be engraved on a paper plate, and a paper hearse, adorned with paper plumes, will carry him to a paper lined grave, over which will be raised a paper monument.—Paper Record.

About What to Eat.

If asked what I would place of highest importance in family diet I would answer without hesitation abundance of fruit. The apple is far more invaluable than we have yet estimated. It should be eaten before meals, and not after. Not a member of my family, myself included, but eats one, two or more before breakfast so long as they are obtainable, and as many before dinner—about half an hour before the meal. As soon as the fruit is begun we stop all study or work, and spend the half hour in sport or walking or conversation.

After meals we rest in the same manner for one hour. No child is allowed to study during this time. Nothing is lost, for the head is thus kept out of conflict with the stomach. Cereals, next to fruit, are of prime importance. I recommend highly such preparations as parched farinose—any food where the cooking is done before the grinding. Gofla and granules are of this sort. As for meat, it must be at each one's option to be sure, but let us be sparing in our carnivorous tastes.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Fraudulent Jewels.

Since solutions of aniline dyes possess the property of imparting to genuine jewels as well as glass paste a deep, rich color if left long enough immersed in them, and since they possess also the property of imparting precisely the characteristic color of a genuine jewel, the swindler has it not only in his power to dye cut glass paste, but also inferior cut gems, of the color of a ruby, an emerald or a sapphire, since fuchsine is the handsomest ruby red shade, while bleu de Paris imitates absolutely that of the sapphire, and aniline green that of the emerald.

Such a fraud, however, can be made still more complicated by using genuine off colored rubies, sapphires or emeralds and dyeing them with the correspondingly aniline dyes, thereby raising their value tenfold. It is exceedingly difficult to recognize this fraud, because the color of such a well corroded jewel can no longer be washed off, even with hot water. Only the bleaching power of sunlight might after a time assist in revealing the swindle.—Jewelers' Circular.

How Wade Hampton Used Cigars.

Wade Hampton never smoked cigars in a rational way like the rest of mankind. Instead, he took the cigars as he bought them and crushed them to powder between the palms of his hands and made use of the fragments as the old regime use snuff. The coarse bits were thrown away, and in the military committee room, of which he was so long an occupant, there was always a pile of cigar shavings on the floor beside his chair. The finest cigars in the market were none too good to be treated this way, and more than one genuine cigar smoker has been moved to expostulation as he has seen Hampton dispose of a fine weed in such an unceremonious way.—Kate Field's Washington.

Tuberculosis in Rats.

For seven years I have been making almost daily experiments upon the internal organs of dead animals in order to increase my knowledge of comparative pathology. The postmortem examinations were made for the most part at the Lamparter Glue works, in the suburbs of Lancaster, Pa. Here of course were the bodies of large numbers of animals which afforded me an abundant supply of subjects for examination. The vicinity of the works swarmed with rats. Many of those, the workmen told me, sickened and died from time to time, and I became curious to know something about the disease that carried so many of the rodents off.

I could find next to nothing about the rat in books, so the thought growing upon me that the disease so fatal to the rat might be made dangerous to the rat's nearest neighbor, man himself, I undertook a series of experiments. My first rat subject was a sick one which I captured in the yard of the glue works without any exertion. The animal crawled about, made no effort to escape from me and when picked up offered no resistance. Its appearance indicated that it was dying of general debility. Its body was greatly emaciated. Its back was arched and its face bore an expression of distress. It refused food, was racked with a constant cough and in a few hours after being captured was found dead in the comfortable prison in which I had placed it.

My next subject was a healthier and more active rat. I caught him only to mark him and then gave him his freedom. He came into the yard regularly for his rations of flesh from various animals, but gradually showed the same symptoms that marked the condition of my first subject, and in fourteen days after capture he, too, was dead. The postmortem examination of these two cases developed the fact that the lungs were badly diseased. Tuberculosis had destroyed the right lung of each and only a part of the left remained.—Dr. S. E. Weber's Lecture.

Changes in an English School.

In 1824 Mr. Milnes Gaskell writes from Eton that an upper boy "got spurs and rode some of us (lower boys) over a leap positively impossible to be leaped over with a person on your back, and every time (which is every time) we cannot accomplish it he spurs us violently, and my thigh is quite sore with the inroads made by those dreadful spurs; my new coat is completely ruined." In the next year Ashley minor, a son of Lord Shaftesbury, died in consequence of a fight which lasted two hours and a quarter on the same evening. The quarrel originated about a seat in the upper school.

Dr. Keate spoke about the sad event to the school three days later; he blamed the boys for letting the fight go on so long, but was not to be "seduced into any namby pamby peace-at-any-price sentimentalism." He said: "Not that I object to all fighting in itself, on the contrary, I like to see a boy return a blow." Such a state of things has fortunately entirely disappeared; a clergyman, a head master, a doctor of divinity, however much he might feel that the meek acceptance of injuries was not the sign of a keen and generous character, yet would now hesitate to mark fighting with his approval before an audience of boys whom he was bound by statute to instruct in Christian principles.—National Review.

When Colonel Van Wyck was running for congress many years ago in the Fifteenth New York district, there was a certain Irishman who steadfastly refused to give the old soldier any encouragement. The colonel was greatly surprised, therefore, when Pat informed him on election day that he had concluded to support him.

"Well, sir," said Patrick, "I wuz, and whin ye stud by me pigpen and talked that day fur two hours or worse ye didn't budge me a hair's breadth, sir; but after ye wuz gone away I got to thinking how ye reached yer hand over the fence and scratched the pig on the back till he laid down wid the pleasure of it, and I made up me mind that whir a rale colonel was as sociable as that I wasn't the man to vote agin him."—Nebraska State Journal.

The farmers of England at a recent convention held at London, attribute the very great depression under which they have labored for years to the demonetization of silver, and demand that silver coinage be restored. The farmers predict widespread ruin if the single gold standard is persisted in.

When silver was at par 328 stamps were crushing ore in the mills on Carson river. Now only 66 stamps are run, and these only part of the time. The small towns in Nevada are being deserted. In Colorado many mines are already closed, and great depression is reported all over the State.

A small beetle is working great destruction in the flour mills of San Francisco and other places in the lower country. It gets into the flour, fills it with filth and stuff like cobwebs and makes it utterly unfit for food. It also gets into oatmeal, cracked wheat and all such material and may be brought here in any of those articles that are imported. The millers of San Francisco have already spent thousands of dollars trying to get rid of the pest, but so far without success.

Los Angeles city is largely Republican, but at an election held last week for City officers, the Democratic candidate for Mayor, Thomas E. Rowan, was elected by a large majority. The machinery of the Rebublican party in Los Angeles is in the hands of a ring of corrupt politicians, who run the party for their own benefit. At the ballot box with the present system of voting the corruptionists are powerless. Nominations made by rings appear to ensure defeat everywhere at present. And so may it continue' no matter in what party it may be practiced.

The fogies are almost as great a plague as the office seekers; and in some instances may be far the greater mischief of the two. Los Angeles is cursed with plenty of both plagues. One enterprise that would be of great benefit to the City is the erection of reduction works. This has been written and talked about for years. Recently some enterprising parties provided capital to build the works, and when it seemed that success was at last secured the fogies come to the front with a petition that the City council refuse to let the works be built within the City limits. Inyo county is much interested in the progress of Los Angeles and will much regret if any stupid opposition shall be allowed to prevent the erection of works to which we would in time send tens of thousands of tons of ore.

In England, where wealth abounds almost beyond computation, at this hour human misery prevails beyond description. Men stalk about the streets in idleness, gaunt and weak with hunger, the howling blasts of an unusually stormy winter fluttering the rags that hang about but do not protect their shivering bodies. Mothers with despair in their hollow eyes and wasted features clasp to their bosoms infants that cling to the dried up fountains of life and die of hunger. On every side these miserable creatures see wealth and luxury, splendid mansions and beautiful parks, all created and supported by their labor; on Sunday the rich going to grand churches, kneeling on soft cushions and praying, "Give us this day our daily plum pudding, roast beef and old port." Wealth created by toil has made the grand church a sort of heaven on earth,

"Where through through the long drawn aisle and fretted vault,
The pealing anthem swells the notes of praise."

But this heaven is for the rich only. The poor must stay outside in the earthly hell of hunger, cold and misery; the peals heard by them being the howling winds that pierce them to the heart. It is a terrible contrast—an awful comment upon the present social conditions. It is not possible that such conditions as this should be endured always. If this is what results frsm our laws, our religious teachings and philosophy, then are we in gross ignorance of a true civilization. The frightful evils developed in England are rapidly growing in our own country, and are only more evident there because the system that produced them has been longer in operation than here. But the same causes are in full operation among ourselves, and already some of the effects are visible in the Unitad States.

Saved by Pure Nerve.

"About two weeks ago I was camping with a party on the shore of Lake Erie, not far from Ashtabula," said George Wilson.

"Shortly after we had retired one evening I heard a peculiar whirring sound, which I recognized at once. 'There is a rattlesnake in the camp!' I exclaimed. 'I am going to get up.' 'Hush!' came the word, slowly hissed through the teeth, from a companion near me. 'The snake has crawled into my shirt bosom.' This was said very softly, and we were almost paralyzed with fright at the prospect. We were afraid to stir for fear the reptile would take alarm and strike its victim. It crawled over his body good naturedly, evidently enjoying the warmth, for the night was a little raw.

"At times the snake's head was close to his face, and he told us afterward he feared the motion of his chest up and down in breathing would stir up the reptile, and he tried hard to breathe as little as possible. Finally the snake crawled toward the fire, and in an instant the whole camp was up. One seized a club and broke the reptile's back before it could make a spring. It measured nearly five feet.

"The man who had the terrible experience collapsed like a rag after it was over. During the ordeal we were all surprised at the coolness and nerve he displayed. With all danger passed he fell into a faint, but he soon revived."—Syracuse Standard.

The Book of Confessions.

The English drawing room has a new fad, which is as unique as it is interesting. On a table in the drawing room or the reception room is kept a handsomely bound volume with the word "confessions" running in large gilt letters over the handsome binding. In it are contained all the gossipy or sentimental thoughts of the members of the family and intimate friends, which they inscribe from day to day. Here and there one finds a line quoted from some more or less noted poet to indicate the sentiment that swayed the writer's heart and communicated itself to his pen at the time he made the inscription, or some sad or joyful happening that has caused him to leave behind the imprint of his state of mind by purloining a phrase from a familiar author.

The name of the writer is signed to each inscription, and for weeks afterward this quaint volume furnishes food for the amusement of the initiated by its curious contents. It is not only in many cases an index to the character of those who are permitted to write in it, but it reflects their temperament as well, like a diary, in which are entered the events of a space of one's life.—Jenness Miller's Illustrated.

Republican Milton Made a Lord.

My Paris correspondent writes, "Deeply as British civic corporations are sunk in snobbism, none of them ever fell so low as, in naming a street after the hero of Trafalgar or of Waterloo, to christen it Lord Nelson street or Duke of Wellington street."

My correspondent underestimated the depth of snobbism in civic human nature. There is, it appears, a "Lord Nelson street" in Liverpool. Even this is outdone in Newcastle-on-Tyne. Some years ago that city boasted of two Byron streets and two Milton streets. In order to get rid of the consequent confusion, the corporation, instead of altering "street" into some synonymous term, hit on the beautiful plan of turning one thoroughfare into "Lord Nelson street" and another into "Lord Milton street," and so the names remain to this day.

The idea of conferring a peerage at this date upon the author of "Paradise Lost" is novel and striking, and when one comes to think of it there are many obvious omissions of this kind in history which it may not yet be too late to rectify.—London Truth.

Congregational Fund for Ministers.

What becomes of disabled and aged ministers and their families? A good many of them depend on friends for support, some on public charity, some suffer in extreme poverty. The average salary of ministers allows no margin to be laid aside. The minister himself is likely to cease to be in demand at an age when men in other professions are most prosperous. Our denomination is far behind others in providing for worn-out ministers and ministers' widows.

A foundation has been laid for a fund sufficient to provide for the most pressing needs. The trustees of the national council, having charge of this work, have in hand about $25,000. The Rev. N. H. Whittlesey, of Evanston, Ills., has consented to present this matter to the churches for three years, in the hope that by that time the needed amount will be raised.—Boston Congregationalist.

Glad to Congratulate Him.

When John Wanamaker celebrated his fifty-fifth birthday recently he received many congratulations and good wishes, but it may be doubted if any of his friends really wished for many happy returns of the day with as much earnestness as that felt by the twenty-four life insurance companies that have issued policies on the life of the Philadelphia shopkeeper. The whole amount of the insurance thus represented is said to be $650,000. Every additional year of Mr. Wanamaker's life diminishes the companies' risk by increasing their premium receipts. Hence the sincerity of their wish for many recurring anniversaries of the day Wanamaker celebrates.—New York Times.

Colonel Henry Watterson has shaved off his luxuriant mustache and intends to depend upon flowery whiskers as facial adornments through which the sweet south wind can whisper its ideal messages.—Exchange.

The late first lord of the admiralty announced in his statement explanatory of the naval estimates, 1892-3, that in the current year three new battleships and ten new torpedo boats would be laid down.

Good for the Souls.

There is a great revival going on in our midst. Wednesday night the groceryman got up in meeting and said: "Brethren, I'm the man who furnished the orphan asylum with meat at twelve cents a pound when it wasn't worth six cents."

When he sat down another fellow jumped up and said: "Brethren, I want to make a clean breast of it. I'm the man who stole the meat that he furnished to the orphan aylum. Pray for us!"—Atlanta Constitution.

Mackerel Will Be Cheaper.

Housekeepers will be glad to learn that mackerel, salt or fresh, which for the last few years has been an expensive article of food, and which is a most appetizing and desired one as well, will shortly be perceptibly cheaper. Mackerel it seems begin to run in our waters about the middle of April, at first appearing in immense numbers, but small size. For years the fishermen gathered them in at the earliest possible moment, thereby preventing them from reaching a good growth, and wasting thousands of small fish that were almost worthless on the market.

To prevent this a law was passed prohibiting the catching of mackerel until the 1st of June, by which time a good growth is obtained. As, however, by that date they have become scarce in this vicinity, the price became correspondingly high. Next April the five year embargo expires, and we will have abundant and cheap mackerel until the fishermen again overreach themselves.

A fish dealer said recently: "It was wicked the way these fish were wasted; for twenty-five cents, a few years ago, you could come into my shop and buy a half peck of mackerel, small and big, as they came. Then they grew so scarce that about the time the law went into effect a single plump fish brought one dollar sometimes. There is talk now of passing a law to prevent the sale of the small clams, which have increased in price from six dollars per barrel wholesale to thirteen dollars on account of their reckless use. That will make the Little Necks an expensive luxury for awhile, but it will save the breed."—New York Times.

Some German Spelling.

In the German empire no department of life escapes the vigilant eye of government departments. One of the latest instances of this benevolent supervision is a circular which has just been issued by the colonial office at Berlin. From this document we learn that the foreign office, at the request of the colonial council, appointed a committee of experts, and presided over by Dr. Herzog, secretary of the colonies, to consider the spelling of geographical names in the German protectorates. The deliberations of the committee have resulted in a code of rules, which start from the principle that all spelling is to be as nearly as possible phonetic, and to reproduce the pronunciation of the natives, not of Europeans.

Then there are detailed directions for the use of the particular vowels and consonants, of accents and hyphens. A promise is given that a gazetteer will be compiled in compliance with the directions above given. A standing committee is to superintend the work and issue from time to time lists of approved spellings, which will be enforced on officials, and which it is hoped mapmakers, journalists and authors will follow.—London Telegraph.

Reformation and Restitution.

J. D. Rainey, of Tacoma, has been notified by Charles E. Lambert, formerly well known in the Seattle sporting fraternity, that he is trying to be a man and serve the Lord; that he "knocked down" on Mr. Rainey's money drawer at Seattle to the extent of from $500 to $1,000, and that he now writes to settle the account. He has asked Mr. Rainey to name the amount for which he will settle his peculations.

Mr. Rainey was asked to-day what he proposed to do in this matter. He said that he was glad to hear that Lambert had turned over a new leaf, and that he proposed to write and tell him that he might send him whatever he considered right, which he said he would assure him he would be very glad to receive. Lambert was employed at Rainey's billiard parlors at Seattle two years ago. He is now residing in one of the Mississippi valley states.—Cor. Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

Bonds in an Old Chest.

A strange case is down for trial in court at Wabash. Last fall E. L. Rittenhouse bought a tool chest from the estate of Henry Walker, and afterward found nailed underneath the bottom of a drawer in the chest a lot of $600 government bonds, coupons of the old 5.20 issue. The secret was too good to keep, and it came to the knowledge of the family of George Knoop, who died some time ago, and as Knoop at one time lived in Walker's family, and was known to have United States bonds, the heirs are now suing Rittenhouse for possession of the money.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

The College of Cardinals.

No fewer than ten members of the college of cardinals have died during the last nine months. As only two new members have been created within that time, the college has a lower membership than it has had for a long period. When complete it has seventy members; at present the number is fifty-one. Austria, Germany and Poland have six cardinals between them, France has five, Spain four, Portugal two, and the United States, Belgium, Australia and Canada one each. All the other cardinals are Italians, Italy thus having a large majority in the college.—London Tit-Bits.

Jewelry Found in a Well.

While cleaning out a well a mile and a half northeast of Nevada, Mo., Richard Kasten found about a peck of jewelry, mostly gold. Over a hundred rings, a lot of chains, cuff buttons, lockets and other trinkets were picked out of the mud. The well is near a house that has been vacant for years. It is supposed tramps who had lodged in the house hid the valuables in the well.—Kansas City Times.

To Enjoy a Celebration.

Binks—Yes, my family took in the whole Columbus celebration, and it about half killed us. Such crowds! I thought sometimes we'd never get out alive.

Minks—My family enjoyed the Columbus celebration immensely.

"I don't see how."

"We staid at home and read about it."—New York Weekly.

Repairing an Old House.

The ancient blockhouse in Edgecomb, at the entrance of Wiscasset harbor, Maine, which was built in 1808, has fallen into such dilapidation that extensive repairs have been found necessary. To replace the timbers which supported the walls and floors of the second story beams fifteen inches square have been required. Summer residents of the vicinity have undertaken the task of restoring and preserving the old landmark.—New York Tribune.

Information against Jennie Powers, Johnnie Gray and Jake Dusky (Indians) for burglary. Defendants plead guilty and are sentenced to two years each in Folsom Prison.

Don't forget the Fair, now on at Lone Pine.

Ad Smith came down from Big Pine on Wednesday.

The Fair at Lone Pine began yesterday; it will continue till to-morrow night.

J. D. Lewis, Esq., of Bishop, is visiting relatives and friends in Independence.

Miss Nellie Craig left on yesterday's train on a visit to her sister Cora at Oakland.

Mrs. Jane McMurry came down from Big Pine on Wednesday and returned on Thursday.

Jacob Braune, a native of Switzerland, was admitted to citizenship last Monday by Judge Gill.

The usual meeting of teachers will open at Bishop next Monday. State Superintendent James W. Anderson is expected to attend.

A great flow of gas in the Con. Virginia and California mines stopped work in both mines last week. Millions have been lost and won by gas in those mines.

Last Monday Mrs. Lanie Barnaby appeared before Judge Gill and petitioned for a decree of divorce from her husband, Louis N. Barnaby. The ground for asking divorce was failure to provide. The decree was granted.

At the last stated meeting of the Masonic Lodge at Independence the following were elected to serve during the ensuing year: Thomas C. Boland, W. M.; Irving H. Mulholland, S. W.; Hilarie P. Cartier, J. W.; Omie I. Mairs, Treas.; Bertrand Rhine, Sec.

Every body is invited to Big Pine to eat turkey at Christmas. Between rests from eating turkey the guests will have a chance to waltz around Williams' hall to good music. There is sure to be a good time and all hands will be welcome on Monday night.

Assemblyman elect Mack will leave for Sacramento on the 29th instant to attend the session of the Legislature. It is expected that during his absence J. W. P. Laird, Esq., will be in Independence to attend to the law business of Mack & Laird.

Too Early.

The buds on apricot, almond and other fruit trees, and on willows and on early blooming flowers appeared to be ready to open during the past week. For several nights past we have had sharp freezing cold and this may check the buds for a time.

Land Sale.

David Meacham who came here recently from Redlands, San Bernardino county, has bought a part of the Meyers ranch at Georges Creek. The purchase lies just south of the school house and contains one hundred and sixty acres. Mr. Meacham intends to plant apple trees extensively.

Dangerous Fences.

A band of horses passing at Black Rock on the way to Los Angeles a few days ago, crowded one of the number against a barb-wire fence at a point where the road is narrow. The animal is mangled very badly. Such fences along a highway are not legal, and the owners of the property are liable for any damage they may cause.

The Cerro Gordo Muddle.

The special election at Cerro Gordo, without making a single change of any officer already declared elected, will cost the county perhaps four hundred dollars. There were eleven votes cast, and the only officers who could have been affected were County Clerk, Coroner and Supervisor. Yandell for Clerk got 6 votes, Hessian 4; for Coroner Woodin got 6 votes, Howell 4; one ballot not voting for either office. Wilson for Supervisor had his majority increased from 2 to 9; Hessian decreased from 7 to 5; Howell decreased from 6 to 4. The Grand Jury meets next week and will surely investigate and discover what prevented an election being held at the regular time. Had any changes been made by this special election the result would have been contested in the courts. In the whole proceeding the election laws had been violated, not in one particular only, but in many. Already amendments to the laws are being prepared for presentation to the Legislature that will prevent all such occurrences in future.

The Indian Burglars.

The four Indians who were brought from Bishop last week charged with burglary were brought up for trial before Judge Gill last Monday. The Court appointed Frank E. Densmore, Esq., counsel for the accused. Three plead "guilty" and one "not guilty." The three guilty Indians each swore that the other one was not concerned in the crime; there being no other evidence he was declared not guilty and discharged. The others were sentenced to State Prison for two years each. E. Ober was interpreter for the Indians. Sheriff Gorman and W. F. Matlack are now on the way taking the prisoners to jail.

Nobody Disappointed.

There is no disappointment about the silver convention, everybody expected it would be a fizzle. When it was proposed it was denounced as an election dodge only, and this appears to be the truth. It has caused a further decline in the value of silver and it looks as if a financial crash is not far distant all over the world. No other country is so well able to face a money panic as our own, though we shall not escape some suffering.

Gone.

A very pretty vineyard on the farm of F. Strohmier, at Georges Creek, will long continue to produce beautiful grapes and "wine that maketh glad the heart;" but the hands that planted it are now mouldering into dust. Last Saturday night Charley Rudofsky passed away and was buried next day. He was a skilled gardener and vineyardist, a native of Hungary and aged about 64 years. Old Charley and his little team of dun-colored ponies were long a familiar feature on the streets of Independence.

Will be Sold.

Notice is hereby given that a bay colt, now about three years old, has been pastured and cared for at my slate range since September 2d, 1890. Unless the owner of said colt shall pay the expense incurred and take said animal away it will be sold at public sale by the undersigned.

That great men eat lunch just as ordinary mortals is conceded to be a fact. But who has ever taken the trouble to observe them at lunch? And yet the lunch oft proclaims the man.

Close study will reveal that your great man in no wise differs from his humbler brother in suffering his essential characteristics to stand forth in his way of lunching. I have often watched with interest this unconscious cerebration as its phenomena disclose themselves.

Several years ago the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix, rector of Trinity church, was a regular patron of the rotunda. He always appeared for his luncheon at precisely the same hour every day, and invariably mounted the same stool with impressive dignity. I noted that he ordered a bowl of soup four days out of five, with an unalterable preference for mullagatawny soup. Having demolished his soup he would descend from the high stool and go his way as quietly as he came.

After this I had occasion to form this generalization, viz., that all men whose vocation demands the display of constant dignity and whose pursuits are sedentary eat soup for lunch. I saw that Judge Lacombe, of the United States circuit court, was very partial to soup as a lunch, and that other high judicial officers possessed the same weakness, or, let me say, sign of moral strength. Men of this stamp eat their soup deliberately and appear to be wholly self contained.

Governor Leon Abbett, of New Jersey on the other hand, always appears to be in a hurry. He enters the rotunda with his hat tilted back on his head and his overcoat unbuttoned. He, too, always selects a certain stool, but mounts it abstractedly. The first thing he does is to tie a napkin around his neck, after the manner of an infant's bib. Then he plunges into his lunch like a man who has no time to lose. He eats a roast or an entree and rounds off with dessert.

Orator Daniel Dougherty is one of the rotunda's most delightful lunchers. He saunters in as if he had the whole day before him and seats himself before the gray haired artist who carves the roast beef. Of course the carver and the eloquent Philadelphian are on good terms, and neither suffers in the general dicker.

Police Justice Patrick Gavan Duffy walks up to the lunch counter as if he had a disagreeable duty to perform. He will glance over the bill of fare as though it were Fox's "Book of Martyrs," and after he has ordered a luncheon fit for a police captain usually throws off a few genial aphorisms to the waiter.

But all these great ones are no circumstance to the great American crank, who begins with a cocktail and ends by attacking the whole catalogue to sweets.

When the head of a mortal gets turned it is always turned the wrong way.

HE WAS A GOOD MAN.

A Vivid Pen Portrait of a Kentucky Minister of the Olden Time.

A tall, thinnish man, with silky pale brown hair, worn long and put back behind his ears, the high tops of which bent forward a little under the weight, and thus took on the most remarkable air of paying incessant attention to everybody and everything; set far out in front of these ears, as though it did not wish to be disturbed by what was heard, a white, wind splitting face, calm, beardless and seeming never to have been cold, or to have dropped the kindly dew of perspiration: under the serene peak of this forehead a pair of large gray eyes, patient and dreamy, being habitually turned inward upon a mind toiling with hard abstractions; having within him a conscience burning always like a planet.

A bachelor, being a logician; therefore sweet tempered, never having sipped the sour cup of experience, gazing covertly at womankind from behind the delicate veil of unfamiliarity that lends enchantment; being a bachelor and a bookworm, therefore already old at forty, and a little run down in his toilets, a little frayed out at the elbows and the knees, a little seamy along the back, a little deficient at the heels, in pocket poor always, and always the poorer because of a spendthrift habit in the matter of secret charities; kneeling down by his small hard bed every morning and praying that during the day his logical faculty might discharge its function morally, and that his moral faculty might discharge its function logically, and that over all the operations of all his other faculties he might find heavenly grace to exercise both a logical and a moral control.

At night kneeling down again to ask forgiveness that, despite his prayer of the morning, one or more of these same faculties—he knew and called them all familiarly by name, being a metaphysician—had gone wrong in a manner the most abnormal, shameless and unforeseen. Thus, on the whole, a man shy and dry, gentle, lovable, timid, resolute, forgetful, remorseful, eccentric, impulsive, thinking too well of every human creature but himself; an illogical logician, an erring moralist, a wool gathering philosopher, but, humanly speaking, almost a perfect man.—James Lane Allen in Harper's.

Mexico's Coat of Arms.

The origin of the Mexican coat of arms is to be found in ancient traditions. The eagle was the emblem of the primitive Mexicans, but when Mexican independence was overthrown by Spanish conquests new quarterings were introduced, and only so much of the original symbols remained as would serve to emphasize the glory of the conquerors. When Mexican independence was restored a just regard for tradition led to the rehabilitation of the ancient coat of arms.

The law of April 14, 1823, directed that he arms should be "the Mexican eagle resting on the left claw of a nopal (plant of the genus cactus). The nopal grows on a rock in the midst of a lake. The eagle grasps a serpent in his right claw, and is in the act of tearing it to pieces with its beak. Two branches, one of laurel and the other of evergreen oak, adorn these arms in conformity with the design employed by the ruler of the first champions of independence."

The allegory thus depicted is explained by the following legend: The Aztecs came from a remote country called Aztlan, and after long peregrination rested in Chapultepec. Inasmuch as they were afflicted and beset by various insidious enemies, who attacked them with the cunning of serpents, their priests searched for a spot in which they might establish themselves permanently. Finally they discovered a point on the shore of a lake where an eagle, perched upon a nopal, was devouring a serpent. This seemed a good omen, and accordingly they chose this point, believing that in so doing they were obeying the will of their gods. They founded there the city of Tenschititlan, which today is the populous City of Mexico.—Exchange

An Engineer's Experience.

Engineer Kavenagh, of the Union Pacific, is by no means a superstitious man, and yet he believes that coming events often cast their shadow before them in the form of presentiments. He tells a curious but truthful story of his own experience. He was running on a road in Central Illinois, and daily piloted his engine over a high bridge that spanned a stream flowing near Chatsworth, Ills., the scene of the horrible railroad disaster. The bridge was a mammoth structure 80 feet high, stone, and capable of withstanding the most savage attacks of nature's artillery.

Nevertheless, one night, as his steam steed was approaching the bridge, Engineer Kavenagh had a premonition that all was not right. Why he should have thought so he could not and cannot tell. The day had been a bright one; the night was dark, to be sure, but not with tempestuous clouds. However, he could not shake off the strange warning that had seized him and stopped his engine. Going before he peered over the edge of a deep cavern, and the thunder of a thousand battling waves was borne to his ears. The bridge had been washed entirely away. There were 300 passengers on the train.—Denver Republican.

What Constitutes a Nation.

Fifty millions of people on 3,000,000 of square miles of territory do not constitute the United States of America. A million or so of people occupying 21,000 square miles did not constitute Greece. It was the Greeks who constituted Greece; it is Americans who constitute America. So many people thrown together on one territory no more make a nation than so many blocks of stone thrown together in a pile make a temple, or so many types in pi a book, or so many threads in a tangle a fabric.

Every nation has its own distinguishing features, its own type of character, its own consciousness, its own life. To constitute a nation there must be not only people and land and laws, but laws that are self evolved, literature that is the expression of national life, language fitted to express that life, and therefore a life to be expressed.—Dr. Lyman Abbott in Century.

His Dream Verified.

Jim—A man of your sense surely cannot believe that dreams foretell occurrences?

Tim—I tell you I do. It was only last week that I dreamed of hearing that good old song, "Still So Gently O'er Me Stealing," and before morning a burglar took my pocketbook from my vest which hung at the head of my bed!—Pittsburg Bulletin.

The Doctor.

The title of "doctor" was invented in the twelfth century, and was first conferred upon Irnerius. William Gordenio was the first person upon whom the title of doctor of medicine was conferred. He received it from the college of Asti in 1329.—St. Louis Republic.

AN IRISH VILLAGE.

Mrs. Harte's Ingenious Plan for an Exhibit at the World's Fair.

Mrs. Harte is an English lady, who has devoted many years to labor for the betterment of the Irish people and is now working to get an Irish village exhibition at the Chicago World's fair. Her life has been one of earnest struggle. When she was Miss Rowlands she studied to become a painter, decided that she had not the talent and went to Paris to study medicine. There she met Dr. Ernest Harte and became his wife. She induced her husband to go to Ireland, and together they made a study of the poorer districts in the northwest. She organized cottage industries and societies for distributing work of which she says in a recent interview: "They are in fact organized industries, planned on an immense and elaborate scale by the great shirt, under linen, handkerchief and embroidery firms of the north of Ireland. I know for a fact that one house gave out no less than a million dozen pocket handkerchiefs to be made by hand in a year, and mainly for the American market. This industry, however, has been nearly destroyed by the McKinley tariff, to the great dismay and distress of the Donegal peasant women, for these industries are the sole support of hundreds and thousands of families in Ireland. I hope that our village will bring home to the American citizens some realization of how prosperity can be brought to oppressed Irish homes by their purchasing Irish goods.

MRS. HARTE.

"In the plan I have submitted to the Chicago executive I have suggested an irregular street of seven cottages. At the top, facing the pathway, will be the beautiful ruins of Donegal castle, and behind the oriel windows of the banqueting hall there will be a room for sales, exhibitions, etc. To the right of the castle will be found a model dairy, where iced milk from the famous Kerry cows can be enjoyed on hot summer days. An old mimic cross and well will give picturesqueness and interest to the street. In each cottage will be shown an industry carried on with the same simple appliances and by the very same people that one would see in such cottages in Ireland. Spinning and dyeing from bog plants and the weaving of the hand and heart homespuns of the Donegal industrial fund will be special features. I expect to show the actual process of vegetable dyeing which I taught the peasants."

It is not necessary to add that this will be a singularly attractive feature of the exposition.

NAVIGATION OF THE AIR.

The Germans Declare They Have Made It a Success.

When the Swiss government last year granted permission for the great Breslau firm of Kleinstorff to conduct aeronautic experiments among the Swiss mountains very little was thought of it. A few days ago, however, the Russian frontier videttes telegraphed in alarm to the czar that airships had sailed over the line from Germany, and now the Kleinstorffs declare they have done it.

The Prussian government offered 1,000,000 marks for an invention imitating the flight of birds, and the experimenters went to Switzerland to keep clear of spies. Herr von Prigeldsky is the inventor and conducted the tests. He and the Prussian officers selected for a locality the two peaks of the Nopf and Santis, in the comparatively little visited region near St. Gallen, of which Schaffel has sung in his romance of the Smoak Eckehard. On Sept. 28 the apparatus was taken up the mountain side, bridgelike structures of wood were erected on either peak and a connection by wires was established. The experiments began on Oct. 2, a windless day, when the country below was hidden in fog. They were viewed by Herr von Prigaldsky, the two officers of the aeronautic corps of the Prussian army and by two civil engineers of the Swiss government.

The first flight from one peak to the other took an hour and eighteen minutes. In the beginning the aeronaut had some trouble in making the ship rise, but after he had succeeded in this he was able to continue his way with great rapidity. On the following days the time of the flight was considerably reduced, so that in the end they could cover the distance between the two mountains in almost as short a time as a carrier pigeon. All in all, from Oct. 2 to 14, the flight was performed eighteen times, until one of the propellers got out of order and certain repairs became necessary, which had to be done at the works in Breslau. How to make a propeller which is sufficiently powerful without going above a certain weight still remained a problem, it seems, when the experiments were discontinued.

Such are the salient facts as given in reports from Switzerland and Germany, and it is added that other airships have been started, so the Russian videttes may in fact have seen some.

Coming to the Fair.

Abubaker, sultan of Johore, is not only making arrangements for an extraordinary display at the Chicago World's fair, but announces that he will come himself with his suite. This is at the request of United States Consul Rounseville Wildman, and through his report the country learns with surprise that all the Malay peninsula is in a condition of rapid development and that Johore is the most progressive part of it. It is now traversed by a railway and is exporting large quantities of valuable timber. The sultan or maharajah will send a complete Malay village to the exposition. He is now the only independent prince in that part of the world. Holland, France and England having taken control of all the rest of the country. He is in his sixtieth year, has traveled extensively through Europe and has introduced many reforms in his native land, being especially favorable to educational institutions.

ABUBAKER.

The family is ancient. His ancestors have ruled Johore since 1311, and before that were for centuries the sultans of Malacca. The area of the country is estimated at 20,000 square miles, covered in many parts by virgin forests. It has been but partially explored. Apart from the less civilized tribes of the interior the population numbers some 100,000, principally Malays and Chinese.

King Solomon's vast fortune seems to have been pretty thoroughly dissipated. H. Gotschalk, of New York, possesses a holy shekel which was used in Solomon's temple. There is but one other similar coin in existence, and that is an imperfect one, and is in the British Museum. These coins are about 3,400 years old.

"Cartier's church," mentioned in Dowd's "Lake Regions of the United States," is believed to have been founded by Jacques Cartier. It is within the limits of Tadousac, at the mouth of the Saginaw river, in Michigan, its extreme capacity being less than a dozen and a half persons.

THE TRAINING OF LIONS.

Darling Describes His Methods of Handling the Fierce Beasts.

The lion tamer is a highly intelligent young man, who, born in the United States, went to Germany in his youth. In Hamburg he associated with a leading firm, the Jamrach, of Germany, and so, having animals in his charge, became familiar with handling them. Traveling for the business, he made frequent visits to Africa and Asia collecting animals. In a commercial sense, considering lions and tigers as cattle to be bought and sold, he became thoroughly acquainted with their ways and instincts. Certainly it was the only school where such quiet mastery over savage animals could be acquired.

"It is a very long business," said Mr Darling. "All my animals have been two years in training. Why, it takes all of two months to make a lion sit in a chair and stay there. I cannot vaunt general intelligence in lions; it is rather individual. I have had some fine young lions, superb in body, that had no brains. Not wicked or cross, but simply stupid. It was a tendency to forget to-morrow all that had been acquired for months before.

"But I can't always tell. Leo is my best pupil. He never was ugly, but once I gave him up and sent him off, he was so dull. then took him to school again, and I know no lion second to him now in intelligence and docility. This is the point. A lion doesn't want to do things. He just doesn't want to. Now, you must make him. Punish him and you make him your enemy, afraid of you, and he gets worse, not better. I coax him and talk to him in English, for English is the best language for command.

"The seesaw and the velocipede are difficult tricks. Not one lion in a thousand can be taught to keep his balance. They mostly tumble off. Perhaps in that performance their highest intelligence is called into play. The velocipede requires a careful lion, and I have just the right one. It is nice work to get the exact pose and to keep it, but what gave me the most trouble is the chariot performance. A lion must have had an original contempt for that kind of business. You see I am busy harnessing up one lion while the others are perfectly free. The art has been to make the rest of them come up of their own accord.

"For months I had one lion tearing round alone, and the rest scattered about. Now they all come up to time. They don't want to, but they must. It is patience, kindness, making them not afraid of me—for I am not afraid of them—that has done the business. I have rehearsals all the time, for the animals must be constantly at work so as not to forget. The whelps are coming on fast; one, I think, shows great intelligence. I feed them eight pounds of beef a day for the big ones and six for the smaller ones, and they take their supper after the performance."

"You cannot reward your lions for good behavior, like you would a horse, with a lump of sugar or a carrot?"

"No; they despise sugar, but love beef tea. But if they behave very well I give them during the performance a little tid bit of meat, and Nero would think I was not doing the right thing with him if he didn't get his morsel. My whips indicate the positions for the animals. You could not hurt a lion who has a tough hide with a lash, but a whip acts as a protection. You might belabor a lion with a big stick and he would not feel it. But he does not fancy a stick, the point of which, like a spear, is held in his direction; so if one threatened me I could keep him off. An act I had to give up was where a lion rose and put his forepaws on my shoulders. The claws are very sharp, and any display of endearment would cut through my coat, and wound my shoulders, and a new coat was very expensive. All the lions are fond of me, and we respect one another."—Harper's Weekly.

His Curiosity Aroused.

Little Clarence is an acute and observing little fellow. He is full of curiosity and is continually asking the why and the wherefore of all he sees and hears. His usual query is "What for?" and this he will repeat until he receives an answer that appeals to his sense or imagination. He has frequently seen his father decapitate a chicken, and "to kill" to him meant the same as "to chop the head off."

Recently he came to see us, his neighbors, while a trunk was being packed, and the following dialogue ensued:

"Big box! What for?"

"To pack in my clothing and books."

"What for?"

"To take it away to a big city."

"What for?"

"So that I can use the things in it."

"What for?"

"To study."

"What for?"

"To be a doctor."

"What for?"

"What for! Why! isn't that reason enough?"

Again he repeated his "What for?" and humorously some one replied, "To kill people."

That settled it. That was the sufficient reason. He looked up knowingly, and naively remarked:

"Chop their heads off."—Indianapolis News.

Growling About City Hunters.

"The game laws," says an old sportsman who is inclined to be a growler, "all are made by city men who want about six weeks in the year to themselves, just when the farmers are busiest with their fall crops. A city sportsman who doesn't know anything about farming will put on a pair of breeches that reach to his neck and wade all over a new wheat field without thinking of the damage he does. I was brought up on a farm, and I tell you these celluloid clay pigeon killers are a nuisance. If I were a farmer I would raise a crop of bulldogs and feed them on raw beefsteak for a month previous to the opening of the season, and when these city jays swoop down and take possession of the farm I would turn them all loose."—New York Tribune.

The first use of natural gas for domestic purposes in this country was made in 1821, in the village of Fredonia, Chautauqua county, N. Y., where enough of it was collected and piped to supply thirty burners. The village inn was illuminated by this gas when Lafayette passed through Fredonia in 1824. At the same time a small lighthouse on Lake Erie warned vessels from the coast with a flame of the same product.

One congressional district in New York, the Twelfth, represented by Roswell P. Flower, is richer than any state in the union except New York and Pennsylvania. The united possessions of the residents of the district are estimated to be upward of $4,000,000,000. The total wealth of Illinois is one billion less than this amount, and that of Ohio and Massachusetts is about $1,500,000,000.

About twenty years ago the Japanese author, Kloyte Bakin, completed a novel upon which he had been at work for thirty-eight years. It comprises 106 volumes, and is said to illustrate all classes of Japanese society and life.

Cost of Educating a Nation.

Underlying all other public questions, pressing, persistent, commanding, is the subject of education. Important in every civilized nation, it is in America of paramount interest. In America we have 12,000,000 children enrolled in the public schools alone. How to increase this attendance, how to lower absenteeism, how to waste no money, no energy, no time but to make every effort tell; what methods are best; what studies are essential; what influences are to be stimulated; how to reach the hearts, the minds, the consciences of these children; what ideals to put before them—these are matters of most profound concern.

Our public schools require 347,292 teachers, and cost annually $122,455,252. These figures simply show the magnitude of the system and are staggering even to the imagination. The future of the republic is committed to these 12,000,000 children and to the hundreds of thousands in private and sectarian schools, to these and not to one or the other of the political parties, to these and not to any church, not to any organization whatever.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Polite Railway Conductors.

There was a time when railroad men had the reputation of being the most impolite of any of their sex. They never deserved this reputation. It grew out of the fact that in the early days travelers were not as well posted as they are now, and they asked many questions which railroad men worried about and finally stopped trying to answer. The railroad man of today, however, is more communicative and more polite than formerly. The companies' managers are more careful of the comfort of people who travel, and require their employes to be polite.

One of the roads running out of Chicago has made a rule that when the conductor passes through a sleeping car to collect fares, or a dining car for the same purpose, he must remove his cap. Perhaps after some other rules of propriety shall have been adopted by the companies a certain class of travelers will do likewise, and one may make a jaunt out of town with some comfort.—Chicago Tribune.

Will Power Versus Coughing.

Dr. Brown-Sequard, in one of his lectures with reference to a check on sneezing, coughing, etc., says: Coughing can be stopped by pressing on the nerves of the lips in the neighborhood of the nose. Sneezing may be stopped by the same mechanism. Pressing in the neighborhood of the ear, right in front of the ear may stop coughing. It is so also of hiccoughing, but much less so than for sneezing or coughing. Pressing very hard on the top of the mouth is also a means of stopping coughing, and many say the will has immense power.

The use of Ely's Cream Balm, a sure cure for Catarrh and Cold in Head, is attended with no pain, inconvenience or dread, which can be said of no other remedy.

I feel it my duty to say a few words in regard to Ely's Cream Balm, and I do so entirely without solicitation. I have used it half a year, and have found it to be most admirable. I have suffered from catarrh of the worst kind ever since I was a little boy and I never hoped for cure, but Cream Balm seems to do even that. Many of my acquaintances have used it with excellent results.—Oscar Ostrum, 45 Warren Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

VILE AND UNWORTHY

Of consideration are nostrums of which it is asserted—and there are many such—that they cure immediately bodily ailments of long standing. There are none such that can. Chronic disorders cannot be instantaneously removed. Continuity in the use of genuine medicine, such as Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, will eradicate chronic physical evils. Not the least of these last in the force of its opposition to medicine is constipation, to the removal of which, if persisted in, the Bitters is particularly adapted. Constriction of the bowels is a complaint which should be dealt with early and systematically, so are its usual attendants, liver complaint and dyspepsia. For these, for malaria, rheumatism, kidney trouble, and more recently "la grippe," this highly and professionally commended medicine is an undoubted specific. Nothing can exceed it, moreover, as a means of imparting strength to the feeble and nervous.

"What a pity," observed an uptown Mrs. Partington, "that America had to be discovered by a foreigner."

DO NOT BE DECEIVED.

Persons with weak lungs—those who are constantly catching cold—should wear an ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTER over the chest and another between the shoulder blades during cold weather. Remember they always strengthen and never weaken the part to which they are applied. Do not be deceived by imagining any other plaster like them—they are not—may look it, but looks deceive. Insist always on having ALLCOCK'S the only reliable plaster ever produced.

A FAMOUS SCHOOL

The San Francisco Business College an Educational Mecca.

The Ellis System Revolutionizing all Methods of Commercial Training.

Prominent Pacific Coast Educators Universally Pronounce the New System a Most Wonderful Achievement.

Nothing in the educational line has happened in this city for years that has created such a stir among prominent business college educators all over the coast as the making public about four weeks ago of the Ellis System of actual business practice. This new system of commercial training has hitherto been used exclusively in the classes of the author of this system in the San Francisco Business College. Through the courtesy of Professor N. S. Phelps, President of that institution, a Post reporter was shown through the spacious study hall and classrooms of what is now, without question, the most famous Business College in America, and the Ellis System of actual business practice was explained in detail. The institution occupies nearly one whole floor of the Murphy building on the corner of Market and Jones streets.

A VALUABLE INNOVATION.

The Ellis System of Commercial Training is an innovation on the methods of instruction now employed by all the great commercial colleges in this country. To state it briefly, instead of teaching the student the theory of accounts only, and doing that by simply requiring him for months to write up imaginary transactions from a text book, such accounts being meaningless to him, the Ellis System dispenses entirely with all theoretical or copied work, and give the student actual business practice from the day he enters school until his course is finished.

Such a system has been the dream of the most progressive business educators for years, and a number of unsuccessful attempts have been made during the past ten years to bring out such a system in a number of Eastern colleges.

APPRECIATED ABROAD.

To Professor C. L. Ellis of the San Francisco Business College belongs the honor of solving the problem by perfecting a system of actual business practice that is creating the wildest enthusiasm among business college educators, many of whom have crossed the continent on purpose to see the work exemplified in the professor's classroom.

The Ellis system has the advantage of having passed the experimental stage before it was made public, and although but little more than a month has expired since the first outline of the system was published, it has not only been adopted by over one-half of all the commercial schools on the Pacific Coast, fifteen in number, but also by a large number of similar institutions east of the Mississippi river, and Eastern orders are now coming in so rapidly that it requires a large force of clerks to fill them.

WRITTEN TESTIMONIALS.

The reporter was permitted to read a number of the most flattering letters of commendation from the proprietors of business colleges in both the East and the West who discarded all text-book instruction and adopted the Ellis system.

They all give the new system their most unqualified indorsement and pronounce it the most wonderful educational achievement of the century. Professor Ellis and the institution with which he is connected have certainly become famous in a day.—S. F. Evening Post, Oct. 22.

MY NATIVE LAND.

There's golden sand in India,
And there the mango blooms,
The wind tides of Arabia
Are laden with perfumes;
But on me they cast no glamour,
Or wake my soul to thrills,
Like the breath of bonny Scotland
That sweeps her breezy hills.

I read of grand Thermopylæ,
And Sparta's valiant lords,
Of him who "kept the bridge" against
A thousand gleaming swords.
But my dreams come back to Scotland,
And pride lifts up my soul
To recount her deeds of glory,
And read her hero roll.

In the far off Vaudois valleys
A thousand martyrs sleep,
And old Rome's profane arenas
Their bloody records keep;
But God has noble witnesses
In that dear land I know,
And the air floats songs of freedom
Where'er her rivers flow.

Speak to me then of old Scotland,
Her heather and her men,
And the lordly thistle waving
On guard in every glen;
Then my heart will swell in rapture
To freedom's mountain throne,
And I'll bless the power that made it,
My native land—my own.

—William Lyle in Journalist.

A TERRIBLE NIGHT.

"Cheerily, boys!" shouted the master. "We must be nearing the coast. Hold hard the helm, Jean! Make fast the rope, Pierre!"

Over the raging sea the fishing smack shot like a flash. The previous day they had set out amid superb weather. There was a stiff breeze, covering with light foam the waves, upon the surface of which the sun was mirrored with bright silvery reflections. Nevertheless, on passing the lookout house Pere Landure, the master, had paused with an uneasy air. In less than an hour the barometer, the column of mercury of which glittered at the door, had fallen a centimeter. The old man had remained there a second, seeming to reflect. Then he had glanced at the sky, sniffed the wind, and had ended by shrugging his shoulders. A tempest in such weather, was that possible? He would have felt it, he who scented the gales a day in advance, and he did not scent anything at all save a good catch of fish. The barometer was certainly wide of the mark.

That was why Pere Landure had set out with his two young men, Pierre and Jean.

Were they his sons? No; Pere Landure had only a daughter, Marie, the pearl of the coast, a superb lass of 20, robust and delightful, with eyes of velvet and skin like a ripe peach. Pierre and Jean were mariners of the district, very resolute fellows, persistent workers, understanding their business, whom he had employed for a year past to go fishing on his vessel. With them everything went splendidly. It was a question which of the twain had had most heart in his toil. They were genuine rivals, forsooth! The master had his suspicions as to what caused this laudable zeal. The young fellows were after his daughter. That was clear. There was a struggle between them as to which of the pair should be accepted as Marie's husband. Well, let that go ahead! Pere Landure was not disturbed. His daughter was sage, and sound in mind as well as in body. When she wished she would make her choice, and everything would be arranged.

She would perhaps do well not to delay too long all the same. For to wait thus in impatience is not the best thing for two lads equally smitten. For about a month past Pere Landure had detected black looks between them, on Jean's side particularly, who was more ardent than Pierre, more choleric also, perhaps, and more underhanded. But that would be settled on the wedding day, and the rejected lover would console himself with a double share of cider. It would not be the first time such a thing had been seen, vexation drowned in a stout bumper—and pretty girls were not scarce in the neighborhood.

Meanwhile they had worked hard all the afternoon, very calmly. But suddenly toward 4 o'clock, the breeze had freshened.

"Hola! sailors, what does this mean?" Pere Landure had raised his head, put his hand above his eyes and scanned the horizon. Down there, away down there, a black cloud was scurrying along at the utmost speed.

"Let go behind," the master had shouted, "and make for land!"

And they had hastened toward the coast. But suddenly the wind had shifted, driving the vessel before it toward the open sea. What a tempest, great Jupiter! Never had the two young fellows, never had Pere Landure himself, old as he was, seen anything like it. It was surely one of those diabolical hurricanes mentioned by those who have voyaged in southern seas, one of those frightful cyclones that surround one with a circle of furious winds had made a mistake as to the ocean and had fallen upon the wrong waters. Every half hour the wind shifted and the mad bark, turning about, shot off in an unknown direction through whirlpools of waves as high as houses. How was it that it had not foundered twenty times? Its ribs must be solidly bolted! Stoutly decked as it was, it rolled from wave to wave, plunging, then rising as if by a miracle, shaken, tossed, dashed, speeding along constantly at a fearful rate.

Where was it going now? That, forsooth, the three sailors would have found it very difficult to say. The night had come on—an inky night—and they could not see sixty feet in front of them. For an instant they had perceived the Belle Isle lighthouse. Now they saw nothing save the horror of the darkness, heard nothing but the sinister howls of the wind as it tore its way through the cordage.

"Master," said Pierre suddenly, "the watch light is out!"

"Try to light it below, and be careful of the fire," answered Pere Landure. "But no," added he, taking a second thought. "I will do it myself."

And quitting the mast to which he had been clinging, the aged sailor took two steps toward the hatchway. Just at that moment the sea swept the deck. A cry burst forth. The deck was empty.

"Malheur!" cried Pierre, "the master is overboard!"

"He is done for!" said Jean, still clinging to the tiller.

The two men leaned over the rail, searching the darkness with their dilated eyes. They saw nothing.

"Tonnerre!" resumed Pierre, "what will Marie say?"

"The chances are that we shall never know!" replied Jean.

"Why?"

"Because we also shall be drowned."

"Do you think so?"

"It looks like it!"

"But we do not know."

"I know. At all events I have an idea."

"What is it?"

"That if the smack should escape it should take only one of us back to land."

"Why?"

"Because of Marie."

"You are mad, Jean!"

"I am not. We are one too many, and you know it. The occasion is good. If you are not a coward we will profit by it."

"How?"

"Let one of us follow Pere Landure."

"Which?"

"Let's leave that to fate, to the first sea shipped. If it is to starboard it's you. If it is to larboard it's me. Will that work?"

"It will."

The two men were silent. A minute elapsed as long as a century. The tempest seemed to have abated a trifle. The waves came less swiftly. At last one of them swept the deck.

"Larboard!" cried Jean. "It's me!"

He stood nailed to his place, silent. Then he resumed: "You are in luck! Besides, the sea is growing calm. You are likely to see Marie again!" He paused once more for an instant. "You have too much luck!" cried he at last in a choking voice. Suddenly he stood erect and walked toward the hatchway.

"Where are you going?" demanded Pierre.

"Where I please!" replied Jean, in a tone of brutal rage. "You will give me five minutes' grace, I hope!"

He opened the hatchway and went down. Pierre remained above in the darkness, his visage scourged by the foam.

When five minutes had elapsed Jean returned to the deck. He placed his back against the mast and seemed to be waiting for something.

Pierre said to him: "Jean, you are mad. You are not going to cast yourself in the sea?"

"Why not?" answered Jean. "Have I not lost?"

"I release you. Remain on board!" At that moment Pierre listened. "What is going on below?" resumed he. "Is the smack on fire?"

"You had too much luck, my boy," said Jean with a sullen sneer. "I have fired the vessel!"

"Coward!" cried Pierre.

"I am no coward," replied Jean. "The proof it is that I am going to pay my debt!" And clearing the bulwarks at a bound he vanished.

Pierre rushed to the hatchway and went down three steps. He came up choked. Biting smoke filled his throat. The wretched Jean had made good use of his five minutes' grace. He had emptied the keg of brandy upon a heap of tarred rope, and already the entire hold was in flames. How was Pierre to quench the fire? Five men would not have sufficed for that.

Then Pierre sat down on the bench at the stern and mechanically seized the tiller, clinging instinctively to the life he was about to quit. Almost at once the wind had fallen. The sea was yet disturbed, but its fury had visibly weakened.

Pierre remained upon the bench as if stupefied, hearing the plank partitions crack beneath him as the fire gnawed them. Suddenly a jet of red flame escaped through the open hatchway. The deck was burning.

From minute to minute the fire increased. Shortly before the sea sweeping over the smack would have extinguished it, or at least fought it. Now, having doubtless escaped from the furious circle of the hurricane, the vessel no longer shipped water. It went along inert, tossed from wave to wave, plunging and coming up again, sending forth, as each succeeding billow lifted it, a blinding plume of fire.

The remainder of the wind that was blowing coming from behind, it was to the fore of the smack that the flames made headway. For the half hour his agony had lasted Pierre had remained motionless, staring around him at the bloody light with which the blazing smack empurpled the waves. Now, suddenly feeling the approaching fire, he threw himself upon his knees, made the sign of the cross and fell flat on the deck, his face against the burning planks.

How long did he lie there in the torpor of his mute resignation? A few minutes perhaps. Suddenly shouts burst upon his ear. He raised his head; there, very near him, a boat manned by four sailors was coming on as rapidly as oars could bring it, fantastically illuminated by the wild glare of the fire.

"Ho there!" cried a voice.

Pierre opened his lips to reply. But just at that moment he felt the smack sink beneath him and a flood of salt water roughly fill his mouth and ears.

Pere Landure's vessel plunged downward, bow first.

When he came to himself, lying upon his back in the lifeboat, Pierre saw a huge bearded face bending over him. As he opened his eyes the face spoke:

"It was lucky for you, my boy, that your smack caught fire! Had it not been for that we should never have seen you amid the thick darkness!"

When Pierre, a year later, married Marie he told her the story of that terrible night.

"He was a bad fellow, that Jean," said he, "don't you think so, my love? Still it is because he tried to kill me that I am alive today!"

"If you think proper, my own Pierre," said Marie, "we will burn a wax candle for his poor soul!"—Translated from the French of Joseph Montet for Philadelphia News.

The Clairvoyant's Advice.

At least one South side girl has lost faith in the subject of clairvoyance. In answer to a newspaper advertisement she sent $1 together with a lock of her hair, age, size and personal characteristics to a clairvoyant at Cincinnati, resting secure in the belief that no one would ever know anything about it. The result pleased her so much that her secret was intrusted to a half dozen friends, and the story is out. The young lady had signed her surname and initials thus: "F. N. Jones," instead of "Fannie N. Jones."

By return mail came a forecast of her future, which, among other things, said: "Shun the light girl; the brunette is the one for you to marry. Beware of a false friend who seeks to estrange you; he wishes to wed her himself. You will live long and be happy, and will gain the love of the girl you ought to marry, but not until you have seen much trouble."—Chicago Mail.

Powder Instead of Soap.

You don't exactly drop a nickel in the slot, but you see in front of you at the wash basin a nickel plated cylinder, about eight inches high and an inch and a half in diameter, rising above the basin upright from the outer end of an arm which is attached to the upper end of the pipe from which the water faucet projects. At the lower end of the cylinder you see a little handle. On the front of the cylinder is a plate which says: "Soap. Wet your hands and pull the handle." With one hand you pull; the other you hold under the cylinder, and a little dash of white powder falls upon it. As you proceed to wash your hands you find that it is soap powder, and if you were to talk with the inventor he would doubtless tell you that in hotels and other public wash rooms this is cheaper and cleaner than the cake of soap that goes swimming.—New York Sun.

CLEVER WORK.

How a Detective Unearthed a Stolen Bag of $20 Gold Piece.

WORKING WITHOUT A SINGLE CLEW

By Chance He Struck the Thief Immediately.—The Village Parson was the Culprit.

During his work as a detective Arthur Wood had many most remarkable experiences. One of his experiences as a thief taker forms a pretty and romantic story. The case required no great daring or anything that is usual in the chase of outlaws, express robbers and the like. It simply required the keenness of perception of which only the best of detectives are possessed.

Several years ago the Chicago office of the Pinkerton agency received a letter from a wealthy widow in Tennessee setting forth the fact that in a queer way she had been robbed of $20,000 in gold coin. The woman said that she had long been distrustful of the safety of banks, and that her distrust had been shared by her husband, who had died several years before.

The gold was buried in various parts of the plantation near Chattanooga which the widow owned. Shortly before writing the letter she had discovered that an earthen jar containing something over $20,000 had been stolen. She had not the slightest clew to the thief, and asked that a detective be sent to ferret out the mystery. The letter was turned over to Wood. It proposed an apparently impossible task, but he said he would go and see what he could turn up.

When he arrived at Chattanooga he learned that the widow lived but a few miles out of town, and started to walk. While he was walking past a deep grove his attention was attracted by a largely attended camp meeting. He walked through the grove to the meeting, and after looking on for a time forced his way to the front row of benches and took a seat. His heavy, powerful form and his strange face attracted general attention, but stirred up in the minister who was conducting the meeting an especial interest.

Before the close of the exercises the clergyman walked up to Wood and asked if he were a believer. The detective, in a spirit of fun, said that he was a believer, and furthermore was a deacon in the church in his native town in New York state. The minister asked him to address the meeting, and Arthur, much embarrassed, made a short talk and led the meeting in prayer.

At the close of the meeting the minister engaged Wood in conversation, and asked him to retire to his home. On the way Wood said that his business was that of a tree planter, and that he had come to Tennessee with a view to establishing a large nursery. The minister proved to be the pastor of a mission church which the wealthy widow had established, and lived but a short distance from her house. On learning this the detective resolved to remain with the clergyman as long as he could, and not make himself known to the woman whose treasure he was hunting.

He protracted his stay at the minister's house on various pretexts, and was assured he was welcome. It did not take him long to notice that the preacher's table was supplied with more luxuries than seemed warranted by the salary of so humble a position. There was no outside display, but whenever the preacher went to town he always brought back with him some dainty bit for the table or some neat piece of bric-a-brac for the house. Under the circumstances the detective's suspicions were naturally aroused, and they were afterward clinched in a peculiar way.

One day Wood accompanied the parson to town, and before returning purchased a large flask of whisky and some cigars. While they were riding home he complained of a severe stomach pain, and said he hoped he would not shock his companion's principles if he drank some whisky. The minister said it was all right, and that he himself had been troubled by a pain in his stomach. He took one sip and then another, saying, as he returned the bottle, "That's pretty good stuff." He drew repeatedly on the contents of the bottle, and when they reached home he was quite hilarious.

After this occurrence the detective's suspicions were so thoroughly aroused that he inquired about the neighborhood concerning the minister. He received everywhere the same answer—that the parson had been born and brought up in the district, and was a thoroughly honest and devout man. The rich living, however, Wood could not explain, and finally he resolved on a search of the preacher's house. His opportunity came one day when the children of the Sunday school were to have a picnic.

He helped to arrange the sport, but just before the party was to start he feigned illness and remained at home. The preacher was nervous and seemed loath to leave him in the house alone, and insisted that he should go. But Wood was too ill, he said, and finally started to bed as the party left the house. They were no more than out of sight when he began the search through bedticks, chairs, under the carpets and everywhere.

Finally he turned up a rug and under it found a trap door. He raised it and descended into the hole. He found a place where the earth had been freshly turned, and procuring a spade he dug down till he unearthed an old pair of overalls. The tops and bottoms of the legs were tied and stuffed completely full of $20 gold pieces. Wood had no more than laid the treasure bare to the light than the trap door closed above with a slam. Through the cracks in the floor he heard the curses of the parson standing on the door above.

With herculean strength he forced the trap open and sprang upon the preacher. When he found himself conquered he told the whole story of his possession of the gold. Like every one else in the neighborhood, he said he had heard stories of buried gold about the widow's plantation. While going one evening to call upon her he saw her standing near a tree intently looking at the ground. He went there a night or two after and dug up the treasure. But little of it had been spent, however, and the rest was returned to the widow. The preacher was not prosecuted, that being his first crime, but was compelled to leave the country.—Chicago Herald.

In the Near Future.

The day cannot be far distant when we will marvel that we ever put up with horse cars. The average horse car is a draughty box, without heat or proper light after nightfall. The horses are a nuisance in the crowded streets of a city, because they double the length of the vehicle and yield more or less slowly and awkwardly to management. We will surely devise some sort of motive power to beat the horse, and with it we must have heavier, more substantial cars, well heated and lighted.—New York Sun.

Can Plants See?

My husband has broached a theory that I cannot remember to have met with before—namely, that creeping plants can see, or at any rate have some faculty equaling sight. He was sitting in the veranda with one foot up against a large pillar, near to which grows a kind of convolvulus. Its tendrils were leaning over into the veranda, and to Robert's surprise he presently noticed that they were visibly turning toward his leg. He remained in the same position, and in less than an hour the tendrils had laid themselves over his leg.

This was in the early morning, and when at breakfast he told me of this discovery we determined to make further experiments. When we went out into the veranda the tendrils had turned their heads back to the railing in disgust. We got a pole and leaned it up against the pillar, quite twelve inches from the nearest sprays of convolvulus.

In ten minutes they had begun to curve themselves in that direction, and acted exactly as you might fancy a very slow snake would do if he wished to reach anything. The upper tendrils bent down and the side ones curved themselves until they touched the pole, and in a few hours were twisted quite round it.

It was on the side away from the light, and excepting the faculty of sight, we can think of no other means by which the tendrils could be aware that the pole had been placed there. They had to turn away from the light to reach it, and they set themselves in motion visibly within a few minutes of the pole's being there.—Mrs. King's Letter.

A Dismaying Bit of Family History.

The desire to know about one's ancestors, which exists in a greater or less degree in every one, has become so strongly developed in a certain man that from being a hobby it has almost become a mania. His name is rather an uncommon one, and whenever he sees it in print, he at once writes to the possessor of it to inquire for details of the family history. Thus he is in correspondence with people all over the country on the subject, and he even makes long journeys to trace branches of the family tree.

The progenitors of the family came to Connecticut nearly two centuries ago, but the head of one of the branches was apparently lost sight of, although some of his descendants were long afterward heard of out west. To supply the missing link in the genealogical chain, the man who is so anxious to learn about his forefathers recently went to Boston, hoping to discover in the libraries there some of the information he was after. He secured a big history of Boston and sure enough found his surname in the index.

With a feverish haste he turned back to the page indicated, where he learned that the ancestor of whom he knew so little had early in the last century been compelled to leave Boston because he had been exhibiting two dancing bears in the street. The researcher dropped the volume and fled, and his interest in his genealogical studies has never since been what it once was.—New York Tribune.

Practical Economy.

How important the insignificant sum of one cent may become to men under certain circumstances is seen daily at the New York end of the Fulton ferry. At 5 o'clock p. m. the ticket sellers change the toll from two cents to one cent to accommodate the thousands that use the ferry at that hour. For some minutes before the one cent sign appears at the window a large crowd of Brooklynites gathers in South street, and the ticket seller has little to do. Office boys and shop girls, to whom six cents is a considerable part of the weekly earnings, are willing to allow two or three boats to steam away to Brooklyn while they wait for the reduced fare. But these people are not numerous in the waiting crowds about the door.

Business men of independent means and clerks of generous income are the waiting ones. Even in damp, cold weather the crowd is there, and in it the ticket sellers recognize men who purchase tickets in quantities so that the saving is but a half cent. If the weather is too disagreeable or if a friend happens along a party of waiters will adjourn to a cafe opposite where a little money is spent, and as soon as the first one cent boat is ready to start they rush madly across to the ferry house as if their lives depended on their taking that boat.—New York Telegram.

Under the Wrong Window.

He bought a guitar and practiced for six long, weary months. But at the end of that time a smile of joy lit up his wan and weary face, and his brow grew radiant with joy as he inspected the corns on the thumb of his right hand. The hour was 12 p. m., and as he wandered through the stilly night to the boarding house where she lived, and directly under that window which had been so often sanctified by her presence, he commenced to toot: (Twang, twang, bim.) "I wandered by the brookside (cling, clang, boo). I wandered by the mill"—and the sash was gently raised with a crash, and a deep bass voice yelled out: "I wish as you fall into your brook off your brookside and trown yourself in dose mill, odor I plow my vissil and call a polizeiener." It was cruel of her to have changed her room without letting him know.—Exchange.

An Exacting Statute.

An eminent authority says: "It is extremely difficult to commit the crime of murder in such an accurate and honest way that it shall satisfy the specifications of the statute. Unless the would be murderer take legal counsel beforehand and follow instructions minutely he will fail nine times in ten, however sincerely he may try. Anybody can kill a man, but he cannot do it in first degree murder style without counsel and care."—New York Ledger.

He would take contracts for this sort of work, and was not above handling the bars himself. Alexander Lloyd, a friend of Pullman at that time, and also a mechanic, afterward became mayor of Chicago, but died in destitution.

Leprosy is infectious, and its microbe has been discovered. The microbe has great vitality, as it has been found in bodies which had long been dead. The germs may be introduced into the system by inoculation, by inhalation, or with the food. Every case, therefore, may become a center of contagion.

WOMAN'S NEED.

The Great Importance to the Race of Sound Bodies Among Wives.

HOW TO GAIN THE DESIRED END

Value of Good Health.—Women Suffer in Silence.—Girls Should be Careful to Grow Strong.

While on every hand moral work, intellectual work, social work awaits every woman, young or old, whose life is so rich and full that it overflows into the world from the home, I am glad to see that there seems to be a growing appreciation of the importance of hygienic work as underlying all work of soul or brain. Whether for ourselves or for others, the first work toward enlarging and dignifying life is a work for the body—that body which is too often as unlike the temple in which God meant the human soul to dwell as the soul itself is unlike what he meant the dweller to be.

All of us who have sought to inspire the very wretched classes with love of knowledge or with aspirations after better morals, have already found that our first battle would have to be on another field, that we needed to conquer outposts held by filth, by foul air, by bad food, by dark and dirty dwellings, before we could approach the citadel of the soul. We have tried chapels and prayer meetings and Sunday schools and house to house visiting and tracts, and have found that before these could begin their work we must send the plumber, and each the religion of the scrubbing brush and the broom, and of light and air and food, and must drive out the multiform demons of dirt.

VALUE OF HEALTH.

Turning from the sufferers in the lower to those in the higher classes of life we find no less the hampering influence of disease. Could the women of the land, alive, as they are coming to be, to every mode of development and phase of progress, become thoroughly aroused to the fact that all progress along every line stops and the backward course begins, both for the individual and for the race, as soon as disease or feebleness of body sets in, they would have struck at last the lowest strata of reform, and we could hope for the future of the race. The foundation of all culture and of all development must be laid here, and women's hands are the ones to lay it. Build we ever so fair a structure on the basis of intelligence and goodness, and soon or late, if the hygienic conditions are wrong, it is undermined and falls.

Without health the beautiful woman ceases to be beautiful, and of little avail are all our years of training and education if the possessor of their results is to pass her life a helpless victim of pain. Could we take out from among the young mothers of the land those who are too feeble to give their little children mother care, all the older women whose health has been broken before they have reached their prime, all the young girls who are too feeble to study and too delicate to work, the number would startle us all.

We do not half know the truth about this, for three fourths of the sufferers do not like to tell. They have learned by experience that their households do not find pleasant diversion in the recital of a woman's aches and pains. If every feeble woman made as much demand upon the family time and care and sympathy as a sick man under the same circumstances would make, we should feel the world had gone into a hospital, and the millennium for the doctors and undertakers had come. But for every hysterical woman who makes everybody about her feel and carry her pain, there are a dozen who drag their own dumbly and bravely till it carries them into their graves.

TO SECURE HEALTH.

But it is something more than outspoken family selfishness that makes the uncomplaining invalid woman dumb. The suffering she cannot overcome or hide depresses the mental atmosphere of the house. There is a protest against illness in the very air. Disease is an unnatural and abnormal thing, and health resists it as long as it can. It takes the spring out of the steps and the ring out of the laugh and hushes the voices of the little ones. And to a great extent it does this whether the invalid is patient and silent or not. The thing that is, is felt, we influence by what we are, not by the much or the little we may say. Sickness is a blight which no woman should permit to come over her home, if she can by any possibility cure it or keep it away. And women, we must admit, in all ages have been earnest seekers after and patrons of cures.

And the result of all experience and observation convinces that if half the time and vitality spent in seeking a cure and in learning how to endure could have been turned toward prevention it would have given us another race. We need to become possessed by the truth that health is the great possession. Dr Bartol opens his sermon on the mind cure by the statement that sickness and sin are twin born, and Emerson says that in varying health we have a searching preacher of self control.

How to secure good health, therefore, is one of the first problems for this generation of women. This is the demand their subjects will make of those they are crowning as queens of the hearth and the home. Give us bright, fresh, kindly hearted sisters, say the lads and the little brothers in the homes. Give us happy, healthy faces over our cradles, plead the babes, who find their heaven in mother's eyes.

Give us cheer and laughter and a little fun, say the fathers, turning wearily toward their firesides at the end of a day of toil. Give us a bright word and a helping hand and your dainty touch on household ways, say the mothers who would give their lives any day to see their daughters well and strong and glad. Give us health is the cry from all the world to its women. Give us girls with a physique that will spare us the morbid brooding of discontent, the hysterical tantrum, the nervous collapse, the look of gloom from the clear wells of your eyes.

This is, as I have said, the problem of to-day. It is not our purpose now and here to suggest how best it can be solved. To the true seeker it will open its intricacies one by one. One little single hygienic law of sleep, of diet, of dress or exercise, the first and simplest that you know, obeyed, and the work is begun. Knowing the next thing to do is not important until you have done the next thing you know.—Mary Lowe Dickinson in Harper's Bazar.

Railroad President—What does this mean, sir? You have one of the suburban trains leaving a station at 8 o'clock.

A Superfluous Question.

What a queer way Americans have of asking a question after something positive has been stated. In a barber's shop one gentleman asked another if he was going down the river on the new steamer Connecticut. "No," said he, "I can't; I have got to go to Mr. Blank's funeral." "What! is he dead?" Now, that was a superfluous question, wasn't it? A man's funeral couldn't very well be a success unless he was dead.—Providence Telegram.

He Was an Old Man, but a Lively One.

We were sitting in front of Davidson's grocery one summer afternoon, when some one observed that "Old Taylor" was coming. He was a dried up, little old man, who might have been anywhere from 50 to 100 years old, and he had a voice to remind you of broken glass rattling in a tin pan.

"Now, boys," said the village shoemaker, who was about 45 years old, and weighed 175 pounds, "I'll show you some fun. I'm going to scare old Taylor half to death."

The old man drove up before any explanations could be sought, and after hitching his old plug he stood for a minute to wipe the dust off his ancient plug hat with his elbow. The shoemaker took advantage of this to advance and say:

"Uncle Taylor, it is over twenty years ago that I sold you a pair of boots on tick. They have never been paid for yet."

"They didn't fit, and they never will be paid for!" hotly replied the old man.

"I have waited and waited," continued the cobbler, "but my patience is finally exhausted. You must now pay me or I'll take it out of your hide."

"Goin' to lick me, hey?" shouted Uncle Taylor, as he drew back a step.

"I'll have to," answered the creditor.

"Then pitch right in!"

"Will you pay?"

"No, sir!"

"Uncle Taylor, I hate to break you in two, but if you don't pay that old debt I'll"——

"Then come on!" squealed the old man, and with that he swung and caught the shoemaker on the jaw and laid him out. He followed it up by piling on, and he kicked, bit, scratched and pounded so vigorously that inside of three minutes the cobbler was shouting to us to take him off. He was a licked man. Instead of having fun with the old man, the old man had made a circus of him. We hauled him into the shade of a sugar hogshead and fanned him with a hat, and after about ten minutes he faintly remarked:

"Boys, was I licked?"

"Right from the mark," we answered.

"And by Old Taylor alone?"

"Yes."

"Well, that shows how a man can be mistaken," he sighed. "For over twenty years I have fondly figured that I could lick that old cuss with my eyes shut and both hands tied behind me, and now he does me up in a fight of my own picking and with all my tackle clear! Please leave me alone for a while, boys. My head swims and my body aches, and I want to reason it out and find some excuse for making a fool of myself."—New York Sun.

An Ingenious Scheme.

We once asked a St. Louis bookseller whether he ever got hold of any first editions.

"Oh, yes. I've got a lot of them stored away in my Chestnut street lodgings," said he, "but nobody seems to want them. When I used to offer them for sale customers would say: 'No, you can't ring in any old truck on us; we must have the latest editions with all the modern improvements.'"

If, at the big second hand book store in Milwaukee, you inquire for first editions, the proprietor gives you a candle and sends you down into the cellar to tumble over a great heap of books. "There's no demand for them here," he says, ruefully, "and I'll be glad to get shet of 'em at almost any price."

A funny experience was that which we once had in Boston. Going into the catacomb like book shop under the Old South church, we asked the venerable proprietor if he had any cheap books.

"Yes," says he, "we've got a thousand or fifteen hundred of 'em, but they're all boxed up and stowed away."

"Boxed up and stowed away!" we cried in astonishment. "What under the sun did you box 'em up and stow 'em away for?"

"Why," said the venerable old man, guilelessly, "we're goin' to hold 'em till they get valuable!"—Eugene Field in Chicago News.

A Real Helpmeet.

"There's nothing like having a wife who is a real helpmeet," said Mr. Stowaway.

"You're right," said Mr. Sassiety. "Look at Simpkins, now. What would he be without his wife? He's just as dependent on her as he can be."

"Is that so?"

"Yes, just as dependent as he can be. They say that when he takes a pill she always swallows a glass of water to help him get it down."—Lewiston Journal.

HYMEN IN INDIA.

Queer Nuptial Rites and Ceremonies at a Hindoo Wedding in Bombay.

LAVISH USE OF COLORED POWDER.

The Mother-in-Law a More Important Factor in Such Affairs Than She is in This Country.

As it was growing late we felt that we had waited long enough, and prepared to proceed brideward. This seemed to be the signal for a new departure, and a procession was again formed. At the bride's house few changes had been made, but a "choree" or marriage hall had been formed by placing at each of the four corners of a square earthenware water vessels, one above the other, and held in position by supports of bamboo. In the center was the sacred fire. Hardly had we arrived when everybody took seats. The priests performed "fire sacrifice" before them, and fastened the boy's scarf to the marriage veil of the girl. The wur mala, or marriage garland, composed of twenty-four strings of red cotton, was hung around their necks, their hands were again joined beneath the dirty scarf, the women sang nuptial hymns in honor of the gods Krishna and Ram, and then commenced a series of performances in which the "bridegroom's mother-in-law" was the principal actor.

MOTHER-IN-LAW TAKES A HAND.

First a great platter of food was brought, which the mother presented to her daughter, who first gave of it to her bridegroom, and he then helped her. Red powder was put upon the forehead of both again and again, not only by priest, "bridegroom's mother-in-law" and the little brother, but by numerous female friends. Again and again was the immense platter resembling a paint shop with its various powders brought forth. Hands and feet of bride and groom were rubbed with red powder, which is an emblem of prosperity, anointed with oil and washed with water. Hands were made to touch each other many times, and toes touch toes.

We could see that the bride's little brown feet were heavy with toe rings, whose pendants half covered the foot, and the plainer toe rings the mother was constantly removing from one foot to the other. Louder and louder grew the nuptial songs, and one high voiced woman, the leader of the singers on our side of the "choree," seemed to be firing challenges at the officiating priest, and he to be replying to her in an expostulatory manner. Then the brass bands would begin, play a moment and stop, never by any accident in harmony. As the noise subsided for a time an immense brass platter was brought whereupon rice had been arranged somewhat in the form of the letter X, which is a mystic symbol used in religious ceremonies from a very remote period, and signifying success and happiness.

SONGS, GESTURES AND POWDER.

Into the angles of the cross red powder was sprinkled by the priest, and surrounding friends began to throw copper coins upon it. They seemed to be tossing for the fortunes of the young couple, one of whom, who seemed so weary and disgusted and half blinded by the smoke, was repeatedly yawning and looking around as if to ask if relief would ever come, while he was nearly roasted by the fire, so near which he was obliged to sit. A pan was brought in at this part of the proceedings in which were two or three kinds of meal. Ghee, or clarified butter, being put upon the flour the officiating woman or the "bridegroom's mother-in-law" proceeded to stir it with her hand and to make a kind of dough, of which bridegroom, bride, mother-in-law and priest each took a little and dropped on the fire, which was now burning brightly.

Finally bride and groom arose, and he, with one arm around her neck, embracing her as though she were a porcupine and he were afraid of the quills, they proceeded around the "choree," guided by the priest, and pausing at each of the four columns of earthenware pots, where appropriate signs of worship were made. Singing, gesticulation and powdering followed, and as they sat again the sacred betel leaf was given to each and they placed it upon the fire. Four times they made the circumambulation, and we were told that if by any chance this was done only three times it was no real marriage.

On the fourth return bride and groom, now husband and wife, exchanged their seats, and then came congratulations. Almost all the female friends came forward and put silver rupees in the bride's hand, and stooping behind her embraced her from behind. We were told that this was the end.—Sarah D. Hamlin in San Francisco Bulletin.

An Impatient Animal.

In a store in Otis street is a firm whose head resides in the suburbs, and who frequently drives to and from his residence, leaving his horse at the door with a weight attached to the strap. The "Doctor," as he is called, frequently grows impatient, casts longing looks around, and sometimes whinnies for his master. The other day, having waited overlong, as he undoubtedly thought, Doctor reached down, picked up the strap, and with the weight dangling from his mouth set off in brisk and independent fashion for home, leaving his master to follow on foot or in horse car, as if, having waited long enough, how other people got home was no concern of his.—Boston Herald.

Right on the heel of the Brussels monetary conference comes what is little short of a gold panic in England. All over that country factories are closed and tens of thousands of workers wander about in idleness and hopeless misery. Money loaners control the making of laws, and rather than abate one poor scruple that is written in the bond they make their country a hell of groans and tears.

The late judgment of the United States Supreme Court, restoring to the public domain land claimed by the Southern Pacific Railroad has caused quite a scramble for the land. Part of the restored land is close to Bakersfield and is now very valuable; several locations were filed just as quick as the locaters could get to the Land Office at Visalia after the judgment became known.

As railroads are now managed the managers exercise sovereign powers that cannot be delegated without serious injury to the people and real danger to popular government. The power to control all traffic in each State and between the several States, is one of the most important that can be excercised by any government. All this power the railroads now control, and every business and industry is as absolutely subject to their will as if the whole body of the people were living in a condition of chattel slavery. In fact the railroad Kings have all the gain of slave labor without the care and expense attending slavery. There must come a struggle for the mastery between the great coporations and the people. There are signs of an awakening on the part of the people to the injury inflicted and the danger that threatens, which gives promise of a control and limitation of the powers now usurped by corporation.

In the praise of Blaine when dead writers and spouters will exhaust their powers of language. The living statesman was carped at by moping owls and curs of high and low degree. It is the old story, stone the living prophets, build monuments when they are dead. When bread is asked, give a stone. Since Lincoln Blaine has been the greatest man in the Republican party; but his manifest superiority made him enemies of all the mean and self-seeking politicians about him, and by control of party machinery these were able to defeat him when nominated for the Presidency, and at last to prevent his re-nomination. In the epidemic of corruption that raged after the war, Blaine did not escape without being smirched in the credit mobilier exposure. The taint then contracted clung to him ever after; had it not been for this, had the compete confidence of the people in his integrity never been shaken, he would have been too strong for all the tricky political scoundrels in the country to defeat him. It has now been conclusively proven that a citizen who has shown himself a man of strict integrity, of unflinching courage and unselfish devotion in the discharge of duty, can set at defiance all the machinations and bitter opposition of political schemers, and the people will force the nomination and secure the election of such a man to the highest office in their gift. Blaine began public life as a politician only, but he had the ability and grew to be a statesman His death will leave a vacancy that no living Republican is big enough to fill. Whatever errors he made were years ago, and since then he has been an active and useful citizen. His faults will soon be forgotten and his fellow citizens without regard to party will honor his name.

Bring me my dead!
To me that have grown,
Stone laid upon stone,
As the stormy brood
Of English blood
Has waxed and spread
And filled the world,
With sails unfurled;
With men that may not lie;
With thoughts that cannot die

Bring me my dead!
Into the storied hall!
Where I have garnered all
My harvest without weed,
My chosen fruits of goodly seed,
And lay him gently down among
The men of state, the men of song;
The men that would not suffer wrong;
The thought worn chieftain of the mind:
Head servants of the humankind.

Bring me my dead!
The autumn sun shall shed
Its beams athwart the bier's
Heaped blooms; a many tears
Shall flow; his words, in cadence sweet and strong,
Shall voice the full hearts of the silent throng.
Bring me my dead!

And oh! sad wedded mourner, seeking still
For vanished hand clasp, drinking in thy fill
Of holy grief, forgive that pious theft
Robs thee of all, save memories left:
Not thine to kneel beside the grassy mound
While dies the western glow, and all around
Is silence, and the shadows closer creep
And whisper softly, All must fall asleep.
—T. H. Huxley in Nineteenth Century.

A Dangerous Fly Bite.

To be threatened with death from the bite of an ordinary house fly is a strange thing, but recently Joseph Swain was in danger of losing his life from that cause.

Mr. Swain had a slight abrasion on the skin of his left hand. It was a very simple injury, not being severe enough to break the outer cuticle. On Saturday, while seated in his house, he felt a sharp, stinging sensation on the injured spot. A fly was biting him, and he had to shake his hand several times to drive him away. Immediately Mr. Swain felt pain in his hand and the hand began to swell. By evening the swelling and the pain had extended to the wrist, and the next morning, when Dr. Peyton was called in, the whole arm as far as the elbow had assumed abnormal proportions. The patient was suffering excruciating pain, and he had passed a night of agony.

Everything indicated blood poisoning, and the physician regarded it as a serious case. The doctor is of the opinion that there is a new species of fly about here, the bite of which is poisonous. They resemble the house fly in every way, excepting that they are smaller and blacker.

The most probable theory is that the fly injected into Mr. Swain's arm some poisonous substance drained from something upon which the fly had been feeding.—Stockton (Cal.) Mail.

Liberality in Dress.

The invitation of an up river vicar to boating men to attend the services at his church in their flannels is another indication of the prevailing spirit of liberality in dress. The old restrictions seem to be gradually in course of removal, and there is some danger that a contrary extreme may in time be indulged in. For instance, the presence of a man in a Norfolk jacket in the stalls of a fashionable west end theater the other evening gave rise to some fears on the part of ladies present that "the poor man had had no dinner." Had he overheard the conversation he would have experienced no difficulty in comprehending the implied rebuke.

In Paris there has been a movement to revive frills and embroideries on evening shirts, and more than one gommaux has adapted the jabot of lace—a little plaited frill that is familiar enough in the portraits of the Seventeenth century. Velvet facings to evening coats have also been seen in Paris, and it would not be improbable that the wearers would ostracize any stranger who would appear even at a club in post-prandial hours in a Norfolk jacket.—London Standard.

Apples in Western New York.

Now that the cold winds of winter are beginning to blow over us, the apple buyers are quietly storing away quantities of fruit to put on the market later on. This year's crop has been a fairly good one for an off year, and the price of apples during the winter will be within reach of every one, it is said. Despite the unpromising outlook during the summer months, growers have produced enough to supply the home demand.

Erie county is behind in her annual production perhaps, but Niagara, Orleans, Genesee, Monroe and adjoining counties will make up the deficit. In the western states apples are said to be scarce, but in the eastern, particularly Massachusetts and New Hampshire, quite a quantity have been bought up. The exports this year will be light. Commission merchants say the year has been especially good for pears and quinces.—Buffalo Express.

A Slave Trader's Buried Gold.

A search for buried gold is being conducted under peculiar circumstances by a man and woman, eleven miles out on the Nolensville pike. The parties engaged in the search are E. C. Beardsley, of Pittsburg, who claims to be state geologist, and Mrs. L. A. Cook, of New Orleans. The story goes that Mrs. Cook had a dream that a slave trader buried $185,000 in gold in earthen jugs during the war, and that this fact and the location of the gold were revealed to Mrs. Cook in a dream. The parties are stoping at a local hotel, and visit the supposed location of the buried treasure every day.—Cor. Atlanta Constitution.

Von Brandt, the German envoy at Peking, wants to marry an American girl, but the German emperor will make no exception to the rule that diplomats in service shall not marry foreigners.

The Merchants' National bank of Baltimore received the other day an old continental thirty dollar bank note. It is not known whether the note is genuine or not.

A Demand for Bibles.

While lingering in a down town book store a few days before election the writer noticed that there was an unusual demand for Bibles. One man ran in hurriedly and bought four Bibles, another took two and a messenger boy presented an order for six. The bookseller was asked if this increased interest in the Scriptures was due to special mission work in the neighborhood, and he replied with a grin: "Yes, election mission work. Them Bibles is used by registration boards to swear the voters on."—New York Times.

Lofty Climbing.

The loftiest point so far as yet known to have been attained by a mountain climber is 23,700 feet, which was accomplished a few years ago by a Mr. Graham in the Himalayas. He states that in spite of the great altitude he did not find any difficulty in breathing, nor did he experience nausea, bleeding at the nose or temporary loss of sight or hearing. The motion of the heart was, however, perceptibly affected, as its beating became audible and its rate was decidedly increased.—Exchange.

Fire Put Out with Cider.

Baker's Summit is without water for more than scanty use for absolute necessity. When fire broke out in the dwelling of George Croft the other afternoon it looked as if the place was doomed. A bright idea struck Croft. He remembered some barrels of cider in the yard. A bucket line was formed between the cider barrels and the blazing roof. Three barrels of No. 1 cider did the business, and the fire was quenched with comparatively little loss.—Cor. Pittsburg Dispatch.

A Senator Fails to Vote.

Senator W. A. Peffer did not vote this year. While campaigning over the state he forgot to register, and his name is not on the pollbooks in the Fourth ward of Topeka, where he resides.—Cor. Kansas City Times.

Charles Baker, of Sioux City, Ia., died a few days ago from the effects of a peanut getting in his windpipe and choking him to death.

The Advance of Coeducation.

Dr. Chaney, president of Bates college, illustrates the progress of coeducation by telling the story of how a man in 1865, on being asked how many students were attending the college, answered, "Forty-three students and a nigger and a woman," and adds, "Now there are forty women in the classes."

BORN.

At San Francisco, Dec. 21, 1892, to Mr. and Mrs. Henry Levy, of Independence, a son.

It is stated that Ben H. Yandell is to succeed J. J. Moore as postmaster at Independence.

I. N. McLaughlin came in from Modock on Tuesday and is at Independence for a few days recreation.

Andy Dell, of Bishop, passed through town on Wednesday with a good band of horses for Los Angeles.

Mrs. T. C. Boland arrived home at Keeler last Sunday evening, after a visit of several months at Los Angeles.

A gentle rain set in this morning about daylight. The weather is still warm and springlike, too much so in fact.

The shortest day is over, midwinter is passed, and the season has been so pleasant as not to remind us that winter is here.

John A. Wilson of Hailey, Idaho, has been appointed successor to Mr. Russell as Superintendent of mines near Benton.

The whisky trust has put up the price of whiskey, but the "boys" won't have to put up any more than the old price for drinks.

J. W. Robinson, of Carson, has been here about a week. He is part owner of the ranch at Eight Mile house and comes to look after his interest.

A new and commodious school house has been built at Fish Spring. H. P. Cartier and A. Stecker, were the builders and finished their work last week.

A Chinaman at Los Angeles made a very proper use of his cue last week. He had been convicted of a most brutal murder but before being sentenced hanged himself in his cell with the cue.

The Native Sons have in preparation a dramatic performance which they propose to give at Independence on Washington's birthday, February 22. Full particulars will be given in due time.

James Logue left Independence on Wednesday for the Soldiers Home near Los Angeles. Jim is an old soldier and entitled to quarters for the rest of his days in the beautiful building prepared by a grateful country for those who periled life in its defense.

L. F. J. Wrinkle, manager of the Soda works at Keeler, and P. C. Grant, foreman, were up the valley at the beginning of the week. They bought several head of horses. Between forty and fifty head of horses will be kept at work on the extension of evaporating vats.

Every taste however choice, every purse however small can be suited in holiday goods at Rhine's. A look costs nothing, and if you don't want to buy call and see the fine display. A fine sight stays fixed in the memory, always bright, like a diamond or a star.

W. H. Russell, late of Benton, is now at Old Diggings, Shasta county. Mr. Russell resigned from the office of Superintendent of mines near Benton, and is now Superintendent of the Reed mines in Shasta. Mrs. Russell will go to Shasta after Christmas and it is not their intention to return to Benton any more.

A fresh coat of white paint makes the pavilion look gay in its new location. It was a good deal of a job to move so big a building several hundred yards, but James Hampton and his son did it in about a week. When a handsome new building was seen well under way near the pavilion, every body thought Bert was about to be married, sure; but it turns out to be only a barn and carriage house.

Will be Sold.

Notice is hereby given that a bay colt, now about three years old, has been pastured and cared for at my place since September 24, 1890. Unless the owner of said colt shall pay the expense incurred and take said animal away it will be sold at public sale by the undersigned.

MRS. MCCALL,
Lone Pine.

A DESPERATE PLUNGE.

A Criminal Jumps from a Flying Train. A Deputy Sheriff Jumps After Him.

As thrilling an incident as any related in a long time occurred some days ago near Tracy. On a Southern Pacific train going toward San Francisco was a Deputy Sheriff named Fred Ames, from Los Angeles. He had in charge a prisoner who had been sentenced to San Quentin prison for a term of three years for the crime of burglary. The prisoner was a tough looking character, aged about twenty-four years. The train was running at a very rapid rate about four o'clock in the morning; the Deputy Sheriff had taken the shackles off his prisoner and sat in front of him, having turned over a seat for that purpose. Mr. Ames was drowsy and made no objection when the prisoner said he wanted to go to the closet. After a time the officer noticed that his man was gone a good while, and started up to look after him. On opening the closet door he found the place empty and a window open looking out upon the car platform. The train was rushing along at a very high speed, the cars swaying and jumping in a way to shake even the firmest nerves. It did not seem probable that even a mad man would try to jump from a train going at such speed in the night. The officer thought his prisoner must have gone into some other car of the train, and searched them all, but failed to find him. He returned to the car he had left and when standing on the platform thinking what he had best do, he happened to look down the car steps; there hanging down from the steps and grasping the iron supports, was his man. The prisoner saw he was discovered and at once made a desperate plunge into the darkness. At the same instant the Deputy plunged after him. Under ordinary circumstances both men would have been dashed to instant death; but fortunately for them they landed together in a mud hole. Both rolled over and over in the mud; the prisoner getting up first, waded out, got under a wire fence and made off as fast as his legs could carry him. But Mr. Ames was also on his feet in an instant and started in pursuit. After a short chase he seized his man, and being the stronger of the two had him quickly secured again. Another train was following the first; Mr Ames got on the track and signaled it to stop, which was done, and both men were taken on board. This train reached the next station, before the first had pulled out, and Mr. Ames returned with his prisoner to the same car he had left but a short time before. Irons were at once placed upon the prisoner, as Mr. Ames had no desire to accompany him in another act of ground and lofty tumbling. Very little clothing remained upon the men when they got back to the car; even the under clothing upon Mr. Ames was torn to shreds, and both were covered with mud. It appears to be at the risk of their own lives for officers to give the least indulgence to prisoners for their comfort when taking them to prison. A citizen of Independence was on the train and in the same car with the Deputy and the prisoner.

A Dangerous Adventure.

John Wilson, of Lone Pine, had an unpleasant adventure last Monday; in fact it was not only unpleasant, but even dangerous. He was taking two mining men, from Nevada, to the Eclipse mill. One of the men is Frank Mathews and the other is his partner, Mr. Dixon. Mr. Wilson started to ford Owens river to cross near the mill. The river is rather high at present and the current very swift. There is no regular ford where the party were crossing, and as the river bottom is more or less quicksand for miles above and below the mill, and the bars frequently shift, and whirling eddies and deep pools abound, crossing at any time is dangerous. When about midway across the river the water was so deep that the horses had difficulty in keeping on their feet. One of the animals got frightened, sulked and backed against the wagon, the water nearly going completely over him. The horse plunged and sulked, while the wagon was sinking all the time deeper in the sand. It was getting serious, but Mr. Wilson kept cool; he knew well enough that if the party got dumped into the river they would get devilish cold, and before they could get out might be beyond the reach of being hurt by water. By patient urging of one horse he got him to move forward enough to encourage the other so that he, too, moved forward. Between swimming and wading shallower water was at last reached, when the horses pulled with a rush, as if glad to escape, and at last got through all right. Mr. Wilson says that in future, no matter what the hurry may be, when he has occasion to cross Owens river he will go to a bridge.

Grand Jury.

The Grand Jury organized on Tuesday, with Arthur Given as Foreman. An investigation of the Cerro Gordo election trouble was had; P. Clinton, J. Dunphy, John Thomas and Nat Randall, all of the Election Board, and H. B. Boland were brought up as witnesses and examined. The attempt to commit a robbery on the highway near Big Pine was also investigated. Constable Murphy was at Big Pine yesterday after witnesses in the case. John Counts, upon whom the attempt was made, is now on the way from Saline Valley with a big team, and won't get in until some time to-morrow. Other matters are also being investigated. It is proposed also to have all the books of the County Officers examined by an expert. Not that there is the slightest doubt that everything will be found right, but as a matter of justice to the retiring officers and an assurance to the people that the men they elected to office have done their duty.

A Chestnut.

A few days ago, looking over the files of the INYO INDEPENDENT for the year 1878, it was noticed that the Grand Jury in that year had recommended that a fire-proof vault be built for the County records. Every Grand Jury since has made the same recommendation. The records have never been burned yet, and what would be the use of building a vault till after they are destroyed?

A Success.

The Fair at Lone Pine is reported to be a very gratifying success. At the opening on Thursday evening Mrs. Eibeshutz of Independence delivered an address that was received with very hearty applause. There was a large audience and all gave evidence of their pleasure in listening to the speaker. The profits of the Fair are reported to be about $300, a very handsome sum for a village like Lone Pine, and shows how earnest the people are in their desire to have a church. Much credit is due Rev. H. J. Winsor for his devotion to the cause. As is usual in most good work, the women worked enthusiastically, and without their aid nothing would have been done.

The Teachers Institute.

It may be doubted if it is wise to shut up the public schools for a week just at this time to hold a Teachers Institute. From Christmas till after New Year there is always a vacation, and if the meeting had been fixed for next week it could have been held without more than the usual loss of time. As to the actual value of the meeting of teachers, the oldest among them in the county roundly denounce it as utterly useless and a stupid farce, and say it is all wrong to waste so much time where the school terms are so short as in this county. This criticism coming from teachers themselves deserves consideration.

Lone Pine Church.

Proposals are invited for the construction of a Church at Lone Pine. Plans and specifications may be seen at the office of E. H. Edwards, Lone Pine. Sealed bids to be received and opened at a Trustees' meeting to be held on Saturday afternoon Dec. 31, 1892, at 3 o'clock, at the school house, Lone Pine. The Board reserves the right to accept or reject any or all of the bids.

She was induced to try August Flower, which gave immediate relief. We cannot say to much for it." L. C. Frost, Springfield, Mass. 6

Doctors disagree. They have to. There are differences of opinion among the best; there will be so long as knowledge is incomplete.

But there is one subject on which all physicians are completely in accord, and that is the value of cod-liver oil in consumption and scrofula, and many other conditions in which the loss of fat is involved. And cod-liver oil has its greatest usefulness in Scott's Emulsion.

A MIDNIGHT MARAUDER.

Terrible Experience of Three Young Women While Camping Out.

The summer we camped in the Adirondacks was a time of heavy storms. Living, as it seemed, in the very workshop of nature, with only a stretch of cotton to protect us, we had a new sense of her awfulness and grandeur. One night we sat long in the doorway of our tent, watching the great trees bend and sway as the wind rushed boisterously through the branches. The feeling of our own danger added to the excitement of the storm.

A few nights before one of those tall pines had snapped its great trunk and fallen across a neighboring tent within a few feet of where the family lay asleep. We were thinking of this as the wind flapped the canvas walls in little undulations, and the great black shadows danced to and fro on the white roof.

It was long past our usual bedtime when we separated for the night. The sleeping tents were added like wings to the central square, which was dignified with the name of "sitting room." Brother Will occupied the rear tent nearest the cooking department. Sister Helen and I, with our school friend Kate, occupied the left wing, while mother was alone in the right wing.

We were trying to forget the noises that filled our ears and were just falling into a dreamy half consciousness, when suddenly, in a lull of the storm, we heard sounds more terrifying than the roar of the wind, stealthy steps came creeping through the woods, rustling the leaves and snapping the twigs. Nearer and nearer they approached our tent, then they paused and in an interval between the gusts we heard a low whistle near us, then an answer far up in the woods.

Our nearest neighbor was about a mile away. Father had gone to the city, leaving my 12-year-old brother as our sole protector. We did not have the confidence in the boy's abilities which he had in himself. Even the fact that his shotgun was under his bed did not reassure us, for he was uniformly unsuccessful in his aim. We were helpless in that great lonely forest.

Poor Kate, our imaginative little friend, was shaking her bed in an ague of fear. She begged us in a trembling whisper to come and get into bed with her. Sister Helen, a very rock of bravery, took the side next to the tent wall facing the direction of the sounds. I defended the other side of the shaking girl, trying to reassure her, while at the same time I was debating whether the robber would not be more apt to come through the opening at the end of the tent, and so attack me first.

There we lay, holding our breath, our hearts throbbing in our throats, and all our existence merged in the one sense of hearing.

The steps came nearer and nearer, until at last they stopped behind Brother Will's tent. We heard a fumbling among the pans and dishes. There was no mistaking now the intruder's intentions. Will assumed a tone of the deepest bass possible for his boyish throat and called bravely, "If you don't clear out of here I'll know the reason why!"

There was a pause, and then the noise of rustling leaves began again, growing fainter as the steps retreated from the tent. We listened breathlessly, expecting every moment their return. We did not doubt but the distant whistle meant re-enforcement from a confederate.

But the steps did not return. The long hours wore away; dawn came and found us worn out by the excitement. The light reassured us, and we fell asleep for a short nap. In the midst of our dreams my mother's cheerful voice broke in: "We had a strange visitor last night! Come and see the traces he has left!"

We dressed quickly and followed her to the rear of the tents. There we saw on the soft, rain soaked ground the four footed tracks of a cow! She had evidently been astonished at the appearance of this enormous white mushroom in the midst of her old haunts, and had stuck her nose in curiously and tumbled over the kitchen dishes. That was our robber. Our tragedy was a comedy after all.—Youth's Companion.

Drugging the Literary Market.

I asked an editor the secret of such small percentage of accepted manuscripts, and he said: "It may be all summed up in the single statement, which every editor knows to be true, that there is an enormous quantity of utter trash being written, which should never go into open market. People are writing who have no business with a pen in their hands, for they don't know what to do with it. These 'literary misfits' are drugging the magazine offices and absorbing the time of the 'readers.' Their manuscripts must be read, for you never know where you may find gold.

"School girls by the droves are handling the pen, utterly insensible to its purpose. Women who cannot even spell the names of their own towns correctly want their 'say' in print. Of course they never get it, but they use up the time of the clerical force all the same."—E. W. Bok's Letter.

Leprosy is most common in warm climates—in India, China, Africa, Madagascar, the West Indies and some islands of the Pacific. But it is not confined to warm regions. It is found in some northern countries.

The tired sensation of the optic nerve experienced by those using the electric light is said to be due to the fact that the luminous waves are of great intensity, and not to a preponderance of violet chemical rays.

There are 55,000 Masons in Georgia, which has a larger proportion of Masons in its population than any other state in the Union. At a recent meeting of the grand lodge thirty new charters were granted.

What Manning Knew About Barilla.

Manning's logic was always fortified by that "readiness to assume omniscience," which is so useful in the ecclesiastical career, and by a gracious Providence so lavishly bestowed. There was once a debate in parliament about the "barilla duty," and as the term was little known, an admirer of Manning went to him for an explanation.

"Dear me," replied Manning, "not know what barilla means? I will explain it. You see, in commerce, there are two methods of proceeding. At one time you load your ship with a particular commodity, such as tea, wine or tobacco; at another time you select a variety of articles suitable to the port of destination. And in the language of trade we describe this latter operation as barilla."

Manning did not speak the language of trade, because he was assuming more knowledge than he possessed; but for that reason he already spoke the language of papal histories and catechisms. The inquirer about "barilla" soon found out that it meant an alkali obtained from the ashes of a Spanish vegetable. "Splendide mendax" he may have thought when he learned the truth, "and his faith in Manning's infallibility was no longer the same."—London Academy.

Humors of Signboards.

The humors of signboards might fill a chapter by itself. Such humor is sometimes intentional and sometimes not; in the latter case not infrequently all the more amusing. The very diversity of tongues represented tends to lead to blunders. In a cosmopolitan city like New York, numerous signs can be found in German, French, Italian, Polish, Hebrew, Chinese, Japanese and various other languages, most of them in the different quarters occupied by those nationalities. A mixing up of two languages occurs at times, and we find signs that read "Bier & Wines," or "Sommergarden." The "etc" in "Soda Water & etc." looks rather suggestive, and a reversed N (S) or S (S) is not a very uncommon sight, although it will be passed unnoticed by many. Wrong spelling, or an omission or transposition of letters, may also cause a smile. "Piegon Holes" appeared on a sign on Broadway, near Worth, and "Excluvisely" remained for years unnoticed on the signboard of a prominent firm.—New York Times.

The Sultan Objects.

Beyond Tangier I see between ranges of metalliferous mountains, upon whose slopes herds of wild horses, enough to set up the Continent with cavalry or tame cattle for its commissariat, could be raised, vast alluvial plains, well watered, utterly untouched by industry, yet capable of bearing grain and fruit enough to supply half Europe—wheat, oranges, lemons, Indian corn, sugar, grapes, olives, dates, bananas and every kind of vegetable. I see a great navigable river, the Lebon, down which all this produce might be floated, between Fez and the seacoast, for rapid export. Not a steam plow, or a harrow, or a thrashing machine will the sultan permit; not a square foot will he sell; not a steamer or trading boat may ply upon rivers which should be at once the boundaries of teeming and prosperous provinces and the arteries of cosmopolitan commerce.—Fortnightly Review.

First Used for Sun.

It is probable that the umbrella, instead of being the child of the parasol, is its great-grandfather, for everything indicates that it was first used as a sun guard, and later on as a rain guard. As soon as it was found to be available in wet weather as well as in sunshine it branched off, and, lo! the parasol was born. The French have their parapluies and ombrelle and their parasole; the Germans have their regenschirm and their sonnenschirm. It is believed that Italy was the first European country to adopt those conveniences which were first used as parasols, and after as umbrellas, until both were manufactured.—Detroit Free Press.

Thompson's Wit.

Some one at a college dinner made a rather offensive speech, when his neighbor heard Thompson say in a meditative manner, "He reminded me of his father." People near him turned, expecting some reminiscence of a laudatory kind, when he added, "He succeeded in being at once dull and flippant;" then, after a short pause, "no uncommon combination."—Gentleman's Magazine.

Yes and No.

In the speech of so highly developed a people as the Celts there is no equivalent to "yes;" thus it happens that you shall never hear an Irish waiter pronounce the shibboleth "yessir" of his English confrere, for he invariably expresses an affirmative by some such phrase as "I shall, sir!" "It is, sir!"—Blackwood's Magazine.

Terribly Afflicted.

"What an inveterate listener Johnson is!"

"Yes, and so deaf too. At Manhattan beach he came near drowning on account of his curiosity."

"Why, how was that?"

"He went out too far to hear what the wild waves were saying."—Pharmaceutical Era.

The sacred writings of the Chinese, comparing with our Bible, are called the Five Kings, the word "Kings" meaning web of cloth. It can be traced back to about the year 1100 B. C.

DAVID C. COOK.

The Pioneer Publisher of Literature for Sunday Schools.

David C. Cook, the Chicago Sunday-school publisher, was born in East Worcester, New York, in 1850, a son of Rev. E. S. Cook, a Methodist minister, a cultured and scholarly man. Since earliest childhood he has been devoted to the Sunday-school. In boyhood he joined the church, and began teaching in the Sunday-school at the age of seventeen in the West Division of Chicago, and for four years following taught most of the time in two or three schools each Sabbath.

DAVID C. COOK.

The fire of 1871 was the beginning of his mission and Sunday-school work on the North Side. His field was one of the roughest and poorest of the burnt district. Here, in a German theatre and beer-hall, he organized "Everybody's Mission," afterwards removed to a building of its own. With an attendance of 350 to 450, he sustained the school for five years without the aid of church or society.

Besides this, he has since organized and superintended North Avenue Mission, Lake View Mission, Lake View Union Sunday-schools in Chicago, and the Sunday-school connected with Grace Church in Elgin, Ill., besides several smaller schools.

His first publications were issued for his own Sunday-schools alone. Neighboring Sunday-schools, appreciating the value of these helps, became his first subscribers. Soon Mr. Cook discovered that his were not the only schools that needed more and better literature than they could afford to buy at the prices then existing, and resolved to make it his life work to place in the hands of the Sunday-school children of the land an abundance of the very best literature at the lowest possible prices.

He was met at the very outset with almost insurmountable obstacles and lively opposition; but the obstacles and opposition only furnished zest, for he is a man of purpose, and it has been well said of him, "his indomitable energy demands insurmountable obstacles." That his purpose was good and wise is proved by the way he has been supported.

It is seventeen years since he issued his first publication, and there is now scarcely a village or hamlet in the land where they are not known and used. He employs regularly six associate editors and some sixty writers, representing some of the ablest Sunday-school talent in the land.

Among those who know him personally he is always recognized as a man of strong Christian character, a practical worker in the church, Sunday-school and temperance cause, and a warm friend of missions, both home and foreign.

Speculating Over the Pudding.

When I was a youngster, said a man a few days ago, my mother never used to let us know what kind of pudding we were going to get for dinner.

And there were a lot of youngsters in that family, too, youngsters in roundabouts and youngsters in petticoats, and life never lost its charm for them, because each day unfolded a mystery that touched life in its dearest aspect—the pudding for dinner. There was maternal wisdom for you! All day long there was something to speculate about, and to be vaguely glad over, as children can be, without quite remembering what it is that makes them glad.

And it wasn't the pudding alone—though, to be sure, any healthy stomached youngster can evolve an amount of optimism over a pudding in prospectu that would put to the blush many grown persons with a fortune in præsentibus. It was the not knowing. Mystery was the finest and most potent flavor that went into the sauce, and the best of the pudding was in the anticipation. Why, they ate pudding all day long, these wisely mothered children, and when the pudding moment actually came they were in a state of uncertain and rapturous expectation that would glorify the most commonplace batter that was ever beaten up out of eggs and flour into such a pudding as the lips of children never touched before. And so there was something to live for and be glad over all day long, until the moment of realization came, and after that it was bed time and then morning and another pudding.—New York Evening Sun.

The Two Goulds.

When Jay Gould is in the city it is no unusual occurrence for him and his son George to be seen together on Broadway between the Western Union building and Wall street. Since Mr. Gould practically took his eldest son into partnership the two are almost inseparable, and the smallness of stature of the wizard of Wall street is never more strikingly apparent than when he is seen standing or walking beside his stalwart son. George, although an uncommonly handsome and well built young man, is not above the medium height, and yet he is almost a head taller than his father.

Jay Gould's demeanor toward his eldest son is a charming study. It betokens a degree of affection and pride that makes the possession of wealth seem insignificant. One day father and son walked into one of the largest banking houses down town. The head of the banking firm arose and approached the man of millions with an air of deference. Paying no heed to courtesies intended for himself, Mr. Gould said "Mr. ——, this is my son," and his tone and manner impressed all of the persons present with the idea that "my son" is a very large factor in the Gould family.—New York Times.

Show Windows Two Stories High.

"It seems strange to me," said a man who had recently returned from Europe, "that some of the New York merchants who sell dry goods, carpets, furniture, etc., do not have show windows such as are seen on the continent, which extend from the basement to the ceiling of the ground floor. If one such were arranged it would not only attract great attention on account of its novelty, but also because it would afford such an excellent opportunity for the display of goods. The longest portieres could be hung up in it, and be seen to much better advantage than is possible in most of the present windows.

"An idea of some of the merchants in Germany is to have their show windows of this kind divided into two floors. The top one is fitted up as a library or reception room and the bottom as a kitchen or dining room. The effect is very realistic, as the window looks like the section of a house."—New York Tribune.

He Was in No Hurry.

Three young ladies at the depot were winding through the crowd, Indian file, hastening to board a train, when the whistle tooted. "Come, hurry up! Come right along!" cried the second one in line, catching, as she supposed, the hand of the girl just behind her. "I don't want to," was answered in an unknown voice, and the abashed maiden saw that the hand she had seized in a fervent grasp was that of a strange young man. She has hardly yet ceased blushing over the mishap.—Springfield Homestead.

Rewarded Five Times Over.

A mountaineer and his wife had come down out of the mountains of Kentucky to go to some new location in Tennessee. They had a little jag of household goods, and both were dressed poorly. After he had paid the freight on his goods he lacked a few shillings of having enough to pay their fare. I heard them talking it over as they sat on a baggage truck on the platform.

"We 'uns will hev to go back, I reckon,' said the man.

"But we 'uns can't go back," she replied. "We 'uns has sold out and hev no place to go to."

"But what kin we 'uns do?"

"Heven't we 'uns got money 'nuff?"

"No."

"And they 'uns won't take us?"

"No."

"And we 'uns is in a fix?"

"Sartin."

"But the Lord is down yere as well as up'n the hills, hain't he?" she asked.

"He mought be, but the chances seem agin it."

"But I'll go out among the cotton bales and find a spot to pray. The Lawd never did desert his own."

"You mought try it," he said doubtingly.

I had told three or four of the boys, and we chipped in $5 and handed it to the man, and he had the money in hand when the woman returned.

"Did you pray?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Fur how much?"

"A dollar."

"And the Lord has dun sent us five!"

"Then we 'uns is no longer in a fix."

"Yere it is, and our troubles are over. Tillie, we 'uns orter hev cum down yere twenty years ago. Up thar when we 'uns axed the Lord for a dollar we 'uns sometimes got two bits out of it. Down yere when we 'uns ax fur the same he piles it on ten times over, and doan' even want to know whar' we cum from or which church we belong to!"—New York Sun.

The Tobacco Heart.

The influence of tobacco upon the heart is frequently more strongly marked than in any other direction. There are few persons who use this substance to excess who do not suffer from the disordered action of the organ in question. The impulse is rendered weaker and more irregular, so that faintness, intermittent pulse and palpitation are induced.

The tobacco heart is so well known and recognized by physicians that when the organ is found to be in an abnormal condition questions to the patient in regard to the use of tobacco are never omitted, and prohibition is insisted upon in every case without exception. I am very sure, from my own experience, that many young persons lay the seeds of organic disease of the heart from the excessive use of tobacco or from beginning it too early in life.

It not only lessens the nervous influence by which the heart is kept in action, but it causes a deterioration of the organic muscular fibres of which the organ is composed. "Weak heart" and "heart failure," so commonly met with in our day, are, I have no doubt, very often the direct consequence of the abuse of tobacco.

The use of tobacco by minors should be absolutely prohibited, not by laws which are impossible of enforcement and which encumber the statute books, but by home influence and command. If this were done we should have much less of the deleterious effects of tobacco, for it is very certain that no young person can use this substance, even in moderation, without suffering more or less severely at the time and laying up for himself future troubles of even more serious import.—Dr. William A. Hammond in New York Herald.

A Mistake.

Mistakes of people are sometimes beautiful things to behold. He was admiring a painting in one of the art rooms of the city when a soft voice at his elbow said "Come along, Tom, dear! We must be getting home." The young man turned and beheld a dainty girlish figure at his side, and a very pretty face turned up to him.

"Oh! pardon me," and the girlish figure hastily drew back. "I thought you were Tom!" And the pink flushes of confused embarrassment reddened the pretty face. "So I am Tom," said the young man with an amused smile. "Well, you may be—but—you're—not—my—Tom," stammered the embarrassed and rather exasperated young lady.—New York Times.

A Wagon Seat.

A good adjustable wagon seat is thus made for a wagon from which the box has been removed in order to haul lumber, wood, etc.: Into a piece of plank 6 inches wide cut two holes, one in each end, and put the same between and over the front stakes of the wagon. At the center and at right angles to this piece fasten another plank 1 foot wide and 3 feet long. Now get the iron seat from the mower and bolt it through the plank and cross bar at its center and you have a comfortable seat.

VILE AND UNWORTHY

Of consideration are nostrums of which it is asserted—and there are many such—that they cure immediately bodily ailments of long standing. There are none such that can. Chronic disorders cannot be instantaneously removed, continuity in the use of genuine medicine, such as Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, will eradicate chronic physical evils. Not the least of these lies in the force of its opposition to medicine is constipation, to the removal of which, if persisted in, the Bitters is particularly adapted. Constipation of the bowels is a complaint which should be dealt with early and systematically, so are its usual attendants, liver complaint and dyspepsia. For these, for malaria, rheumatism, kidney trouble, and more recently "la grippe," this highly and professionally commended medicine is an undoubted specific. Nothing can exceed it, moreover, as a means of imparting strength to the feeble and nervous.

Nothing keeps a stingy man from stealing but the risk of the thing.

LETTER FROM CYRUS W. FIELD, JR.

8 EAST 56TH STREET, NEW YORK, May 8th, 1883.

Several times this Winter I have suffered from severe colds on my lungs. Each time I have applied ALLCOCK'S POROUS PLASTERS, and in every instance I have been quickly relieved by applying one across my chest and one on my back. My friends, through my advice, have tried the experiment and also found it most successful. I feel that I can recommend them most highly to any one who may see fit to try them.

For the Good of Others

Rev. Mr. Williams Heartily Endorses Hood's Sarsaparilla.

We are pleased to present this from Rev. A. A. Williams, of the Sillsbee street Christian Church, Lynn, Mass.:

"I see no reason why a clergyman, more than a layman, who knows whereof he speaks, should hesitate to approve an Article of Merit

and worth, from which he or his family have been signally benefited, and whose commendation may serve to extend those benefits to others by increasing their confidence. My wife has for many years been a sufferer from severe

Nervous Headache

for which she found little help. She has tried many things that promised well but performed little. Last fall a friend gave her a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla. It seems surprising what simply one bottle could and did do for her. The attacks of headache decreased in number and were less violent in the intensity, while her general health has been improved. Her appetite has also been better. From our experience with

Hood's Sarsaparilla

I have no hesitation in endorsing its merits." A. A. WILLIAMS.

There's a wide difference between the help that's talked of and the help that's guaranteed.

Which do you want, when you're buying medicine?

If you're satisfied with words, you get them with every blood-purifier but one. That one is Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. With that, you get a guarantee. If it doesn't help you, you have your money back. On this plan, a medicine that promises help is pretty sure to give it.

But it's because the medicine is different, that it's sold differently. It's not like the sarsaparillas, which are said to be good for the blood in March, April, and May. At all seasons and in all cases, it cures permanently, as nothing else can, all the diseases arising from a torpid liver or from impure blood.

It's the best blood-purifier, and it's the cheapest, no matter how many doses are offered for a dollar.

With this, you pay only for the good you get.

"So young, he cannot know the way,"
Thus I heard a mother say
At the close of a summer day;
But he knew the road, it seems,
Into the shadow land of dreams,
And she wept above his clay
Since, though young, he knew the way.

Gone, where summer moths resort,
Or small boats that leave the port,
Sailing over the stormy brine,
As, with this long sleeve of mine,
Under the gloom of alien skies
I dry my weeping eyes.

If I could be where the billow whirls,
In a lacquered skiff, with a paddle of pearls,
Young no more, but old and gray,
You may be sure I'd know the way.
—R. H. Stoddard in Scribner's.

AN IDYL OF THE HT.

It is sunset at the HT ranch. Four or five cowboys sit gloomily about, outside the ranch house, awaiting supper. The Mexican cook has just begun his fragrant task, so a half hour must elapse before these Arabs are fed. Their ponies are turned into the wire pasture, their big Colorado saddles repose astride the low pale fence which surrounds the house, and it is evident that their riding is over for the day.

Why are they gloomy? Not a boy of them can tell. One is from Princeton, too. They have been partners and companeros and "worked" the HT cattle together for months, and nothing ever came in misunderstanding or cloud. The ranch house is their home, and theirs has been the unity of brothers.

A week ago a pretty girl, the daughter of one of the owners, came to the ranch from the east. She was protected in this venture by an old and gnarled aunt, watchful as a ferret, sour as a lime. Not that the pretty girl needs watching; she is indeed in every move propriety's climax. No soft or dulcet reason woos her to the west; she comes on no love errand. She is elegantly and profoundly tired of the east, that is all, and longs for western air and western sights. She has been at the HT ranch a week, and the boys have met her, every one. The meeting or meetings were marked by awkwardness as to the boys, utter indifference as to the pretty girl. She met them as she met the ponies, cows, horned toads and other animals, domestic and indigenous to eastern New Mexico. While every cowboy was blushingly conscious of her, she was purely and serenely guiltless of giving him a thought.

Before this pretty girl came the boys were friends, and the calm tenor of their relations with each other had never a ripple. She was not there a day before each drew himself insensibly from the others, and a vague hostility shone dimly in their eyes. It was the instinct of the fighting male animal aroused by the presence of the pretty girl. She, however, proceeded on her daily way, sweetly unconscious of the sentiments she had awakened.

Men are mere animals; women are, too, for that matter, but they are very different animals from men. The effort the race makes to be the other, better or different than beasts fails. It always failed; it will always fail. Civilization—culture—is the variest veneer and famously thin. A year on the plains cracks this veneer—this shell—and leaves the animal exposed. This is by the expanding growth of all that is animalish in a man; these attributes of the physical being fed and pampered by a plains existence.

The dark, vague, impalpable differences which cut off each of these creatures from his fellows and inspired him with an unreasoning and unmeasurable hate had grown with the brief week of their existence. A philosopher would look for trouble soon on the HT.

"What did you go and take my saddle for yesterday, Bill?" said Jack Moore to a boy by the name of Bill Watkins.

"'Cause I allows I'll ride it some," says Watkins. "I thought it might like to carry a high grade cowpuncher once."

"Well, don't take it no more," said Moore, moodily, ignoring the gay insolence in the reply. "Leastwise, don't come a-takin' of it an' sayin' nothin'. You can palaver Americano, can't you? When you aims to ride my saddle agin, ask for it; if you can't talk make signs, and if you can't make sign, shake a bush, but don't go Injunin' off no saddle of mine no more."

"Whatever do you allow is liable to happen if I take it agin tomorry?" inquired Bill in high scorn.

Bill was of a more vivacious temper than the gloomy Moore.

"You takes it agin an' I mingles with you a whole lot, mighty prompt," replied Moore in a tone of obstinate injury.

These boys were brothers in affection before that pretty girl came, and either would have gone afoot all day to lend his saddle to the other. Going afoot, too, is the last thing, let me assure you, a cowboy will do.

"Well, don't you fail to mingle none," said Bill, with cheerful ferocity," on account of its being me. I crossed the trail of the shorthorn like you, over on the Panhandle onct, an' puts him in the fire an' has plenty of fun with him."

"Stop the play now, right yere," said Tom Rawlins, the HT range boss, who was sitting close at hand. "You all spring trouble 'round yere an' I'll be in it. Whatever's the matter with all you people anyway? You're like a passel of sore 'head' dogs for more'n a week now. You're shorely too many for me to sabe, an' I cl'ar gives you up."

The boys started some grumbling reply, but the cook called them to supper just then, and, one animalism becoming overshadowed by another, they forgot their rancor and vague animosities in thoughts of supplying their hunger. Toward the last of the repast Rawlins arose and going to another room began overlooking some entries in the ranch books.

The pretty girl did not eat at the ranch table. She had little banquets in her own room. Just then she was in her own room and began singing in a low tenor some tender little love song that seemed born of a sigh and a tear. The boys at supper heard her, and their resentment of each other's existence began again to flame in their breasts and burn deeply in their eyes. None of these savages was in the least degree in love with the pretty girl either. They might have become so, all or any of them.

The singing went on in a cooling, soft way that did not bring you the words—only the music.

"What I says about my saddle a while back, I means," said Moore, finally, turning dark looks on Watkins.

"See yere," said Watkins, in an exasperated tone—he was as vicious as Moore—"if you're p'intin' out for a war jig with me, don't fool round none for reasons, but jest let 'er roll. Come a-runnin', an' don't bother none with ceremony."

"A man don't need to have no reasons for crawlin' you none," said Moore. "You're fair game, you are. Anyone's licensed to chase you round jest for fun an' exercise."

"You can gamble," said Watkins confidently, "any man as chases me 'round much will regard it as a thrillin' pastime. He won't get fat at it—none whatever."

"As you all seem to feel that away," said Moore, "I'll step out and shoot with you right now."

"Well, I'll shore go you," said Watkins.

They arose and stepped out at the door. It was gathering dark, but it was light enough to shoot by.

The other cowboys followed in silence. Not one said a word in comment or interference. They were grave and serious, but passive. It is not good form to interfere with other people's duels in the southwest. The pretty girl was still singing, and the strains fell softly on the ears of the cowboys. Every one, whether onlooker or principal, felt inspired with a lurking, pleased anticipation of the blood to be soon set flowing. Nothing was said of distance. They separated to about forty paces and turned to face each other. Each wore his "Colt's 45," the loosely buckled belt letting it rest low down on the right hip. Each threw down his big hat and stood at apparent ease, with his thumbs caught in the pistol belt.

"Shall you give the word, or me?" said Moore.

"You give it," said Watkins. "It'll be a funny passage in American history if you get your artillery to the front any sooner than I do, then."

"Be you ready?" asked Jack.

"Shore."

"Then—go!"

"Bang! Bang! Bang! Bang!" went both pistols together, and with a rapidity not to be counted. Moore got a crease in his left shoulder—a mere wound to the flesh—and Watkins fell with a bullet in his side. Rawlins, the range boss, came running out. He understood all at a look. Hastily examining Moore he discovered that his hurt was nothing serious. The others carried Watkins into the house.

"Take my pony, saddled at the fence, Jack," said Rawlins, "and pull your freight. This yere man's goin' to die."

"Which I shorely hopes he does," said Jack, bitterly. "I'll go, though; I ain't got no use for none of these yere he-shorthorns around the HT."

So he took Rawlins' pony, and when he stopped riding in the morning it was no marvel that the poor pony hung his head dejectedly, while his flanks steamed and quivered. He was almost 100 miles from his last corn, and cooled his nervous muzzle as he took his morning drink in the Rio Pecos, a stream far to the west of the HT.

* * * * * * *

"Some shooting scrape about their saddles, miss; that's all." So reported Rawlins to the pretty girl.

"Isn't it horrible!" shuddered the pretty girl, in reply.

The next morning the pretty girl and her gnarled and twisted aunt paid the injured Watkins a visit. This sight so affected the other three cowboys that they at once saddled and rode away to the northwest to work some cattle on the Ocate Mesa. They intended to be gone three months. They looked black and forbidding as they galloped away.

"It's a pity Jack Moore ain't no better pistol shot," said one, as the picture of the pretty girl visiting the wounded Watkins arose in his mind.

"That's whatever," assented the others.

The pretty girl was full of sympathy for the stricken Watkins. It occurred to her, too, that his profile was clear and handsome. He was certainly very pale, and this stirred the depths of her feminine nature. She and her aunt came to see the invalid every day. Once the pretty girl said she would bring him a book to read and while away the hours which seemed shod with lead.

"I can't read," said Watkins, in a tone of deepest shame. "I never learned. I should like to read, too, but there's no one to teach me. So that settles that," and the rascal expressed a deep sigh.

Watkins lied. It was he who was the Princeton man. He said afterward that this lie was the only real good work he ever did in his life.

So the pretty girl came every day and gave Watkins a reading lesson, while the gnarled aunt read a book and watched them through the open door.

"By the way," said Watkins one day, "where's Moore?"

"Why?" asked the range boss, to whom the question was put.

"You tell him," said Watkins, his eyes beginning to gather rage, "that when I get out I'll be lookin' for him with something besides a field glass."

"Oh, no!" said the pretty girl, rising and coming toward his couch. Her tone showed disturbance and fear at the thought.

As he gazed at her the look changed in his eyes. Hate for Moore gave place to something else.

"No," he said at last. "Tell him it's all right, Rawlins."

The pretty girl thought him very noble.

Watkins was out in five weeks and could go about the ranch. One night Rawlins thought he heard a pony in the yard and arose to remedy the matter. As he stepped out a couple passed him in the moonlight. It was Watkins and the pretty girl. The caitiff's arm was round her.—Dan Quin in Kansas City Times.

WORKS IN INDIA.

Blanche B. Cox, Staff Captain of the Salvation Army Talks of Her Labors.

BARE FEET AND THE BEGGING BOWL

Salvation Soldiers, Women and Men, in Breechcloth and Tanned Skin in the Queen's Empire.

Staff Captain Blanche B. Cox, of the Salvation Army, comes from the burning plains of India. It is a long time since the army in this city had news of that far off field, and her comrades listen eagerly to Captain Cox's stories.

The captain is a slight young woman, not yet past the age of girlhood. Indeed she looks as though she were hardly out of her teens, but in every action, and in her method of speaking, there was displayed a firmness and vigor which showed there was no lack of either mental or physical ability in the pretty head or the slight frame. She is an English girl, and speaks with an accent which would set some of our fair Anglomaniacs wild with envy could they hear it; to emulate it is not possible without British birth and education.

"In the first place," she said, while her visitor was noticing these things, "the rule there, as it is everywhere in Salvation Army work, is adaptation to the people and customs of the country. Of course this means in dress as well as in food and manner of living.

"Bare feet? Oh, yes; neither men nor women wear anything on their feet, and the object is, as I have said, to be as like the natives as possible. Going barefoot is very painful at first, for the hot ground blisters and cracks the skin of our feet, so that in a very short time we are unable to walk. Then we rest for a fortnight or so, after which we are ready to get our 'sole and heel'—that is, the skin on the soles of our feet get so hard that we can walk on almost anything, except red hot iron, and I don't know but that some of the natives who have never had a shoe or sandal on their feet could do this if they moved quickly.

"In India some of the religious sects, as no doubt you know, also live entirely on alms. Even in this we imitate their customs, and many of our officers are provided with begging bowls and solicit alms from door to door, living upon the food they thus collect.

"Our dress, with its religious color, is of the greatest assistance. It is recognized everywhere, and gains us admission to places where no European, dressed as a European, could go. We are thus enabled to gain entrance in the zenana, where none but native women, and not all of them, may enter. The zenana is the place where women live, and it is not to be profaned by the feet of Christians. I once gained admission into a Buddhist temple when the English missionary, dressed in European clothes, was barred out. That was because of my bare feet and my costume. The priests of the temple refused to admit the missionary, but allowed me to enter, saying, as he pointed to my bare feet and my yellow cloth garment, 'she is one of us, but you are not.'

"Yes, we find some difficulty on account of the caste prejudice, but that is rapidly being broken down now. But when we get people into our new homes they will not at first eat with us nor eat the food which we cook. So we have to let each caste cook their own food and eat together. After they are converted they do not care about this form any longer, but eat with us or with anybody else. The pariahs, or outcasts, are very easy to reach, and we have no difficulty at all with them outside of their own settled belief in their religion.

"One of the greatest difficulties we find is the overcoming of their prejudice against Christianity as they have seen it. They make no distinction, but call everybody a Christian who has a white face, and the people from Christian countries who have gone to India for business purposes have so abused the confidence of the natives for their own ends that it is difficult to make the natives believe that there is a good Christian.

"We have a Rescue home for girls in Bombay and are able to do a great deal of good among these unfortunate creatures. We have a novel way of helping the girls to keep straight after we have secured places for them and sent them from the home. They cannot read nor write, so we give them a lot of red and blue tickets, together with a quantity of stamped and addressed envelopes. We have them send us one of these tickets every week. If they are getting along all right and having no trouble they send us a red ticket, but if they are in trouble or in danger of lapsing from the right path they send us a blue ticket. In the latter case we immediately send an officer to look after them and either help them out of their trouble, where they are, if this be possible, or bring them back to the home again if necessary. They are very grateful to us once we have shown them the errors of their ways and will bring other girls to us that we may help them.

"Then there is our Prison Gate Home. We have one in Bombay and one in Colombo. Into these we bring so many discharged prisoners as we are able to secure from the jails. Prisoners are released early in the morning, and in Bombay, where we are not permitted to go inside of the jail, we have two officers stationed at the gate every morning, who induce the prisoners as they are released to come to our home, where we can work with them personally and convert them.

"When we enter the work in India we all adopt Indian names. My name at first was Kariman, but when Mrs. Tucker, the wife of Major Tucker, and the second daughter of General Booth, came to India, she wished to be called Raheeman, which signifies 'love.' That sounded too much like my name, and so I changed mine to Veeramani, which means 'a jewel of war.'"

Captain Cox was one of the editors of the Anglo-Indian War Cry, which is printed in English in Bombay. She was stricken down with smallpox and lay for three months in the hospital of an Englishwoman in that city. She must have had good care, for not a mark of the scourge can be detected upon her pretty face. While she was in the hospital Weeresoniya, a Buddhist priest, who had become a member of the army, died of cholera. After Captain Cox recovered she traveled all over northern India lecturing in order to raise funds to assist the army in the work. She crosses the Himalayas on horseback—a feat of which her slight figure would hardly give you reason to suspect her capable. She gives a good account of the treatment of the Salvationists in India by the natives, and thinks them hardly capable of producing such scenes of personal conflict with and persecution of the army as we read of as occuring in more civilized countries.—New York Recorder.

A Fortunate Senator.

Senator Sawyer's daughter, Mrs. Howard Ganson White, is perfectly devoted to her father, and her attentions to his comfort seem to have no end. The senator is continually seen out with her, although he much prefers home quiet to society whirl. Still what Mrs. White says is his law. When night sessions compel his attendance Mrs. White is assiduous in her attempts to make him comfortable. Everybody about the senate has a soft spot for the senator, and aids and abets Mrs. White most willingly. On one occasion of a night session, when the senator insisted that it was his duty to stay, Mrs. White gave it up and drove away. In about an hour she appeared in the senate corridor, followed by her footman, bearing a large warm blanket that she had carried to the senator's committee room, so that when able he could catch a nap in comfort.

Mrs. White isn't the only one who looks after senators' comfort on such occasion. The senator smokes only a certain kind of cigar, never buys one at the Capitol or smokes those given him. At the same session when Mrs. White was so thoughtful this senator's wife appeared at the door, and, as her husband couldn't leave a second, begged the doorkeeper to get to him a bunch of cigars she had brought, because she knew he hadn't any, and he wouldn't be able to stand it without his own cigars.—Washington Post.

The Club Among Savages.

The club or mace was probably the first, as it is the most universal, weapon, and every nation would seem to have some form peculiar to itself. The Maori spent years of labor in grinding to shape his battledorelike "meri" out of jade or greenstone; the New Britain savage makes a hole through a granite pebble by dropping water on it while hot, and thus forms the head of his club; the Fijian found ready to his hand a tree, whose evenly radiating roots he trimmed into an exact likeness of the mediæval "morgenstern," wherewith the Swiss battered down the Austrian ranks at Sempach.

The mace of the Persian horseman was of steel, with a head formed of six or more radiating blades or ridges, and had often a basket hilt like a sword. The terrible Mahmud of Ghazni, like the knight of Border song, "at his saddle girth had a good steel sperthe, full ten pound weight and more," and it was with this that he shattered the idol of Somnauth before the eyes of the horrified priests, strewing the temple floor with the jewels hidden within.—Chambers' Journal.

Corot and Daubigny.

We readily associate the names of Corot and Daubigny, and with reason. Notwithstanding the twenty years' seniority of the former artist they were intimate friends, sharing many similar aspirations in art, while each still preserved his distinct individuality. Corot was more subjective, tingeing his works with his own peculiar poetic fancy. Daubigny, on the other hand, gave himself up more to the impression of the moment, endeavoring to express the local qualities of form and color in all their brilliancy and freshness. He did not reach perfection of style at the beginning of his career, but through most devoted study, guided by the native strength and originality of his views; nor did this high epoch of landscape art come hastily or accidentally, but was made possible by the united efforts of many men and minds working together during the first half of our century.—Century.

A Mad Horse.

There are a number of stories about the fury of horses on the battlefield and occasionally they seem to go mad. One instance of this was an Arabian horse at Balaklava, which rushed at an English soldier who happened to be drawing water, seized him in his mouth and threw him down, and then, kneeling upon him, tore at his breast and actually bit off his hand. Before this terror could be subdued he bit off another soldier's finger and seriously injured the veterinary surgeon of the regiment. There was no battle in progress on the occasion, but it is highly probable that a military life and the attendant excitement had driven the horse crazy.—Washington Star.

An Appeal for Consistency.

A burly officer, who hated prudery, had been listening to a story by a chipper lieutenant concerning a fight he had with another person. Immediately afterward he was called to account for saying, "I differ with you." Quoth the lieutenant, "You should have said, 'I differ from you.'" The burly officer raised his voice when he responded, "Then, lieutenant, if that be correct, why in thunder didn't you say that you had a fight from Joe Parker, not a fight with Joe Parker?"—Cor. Glycerin for Glass Stoppers.

If glycerin is poured around a glass stopper there is no necessity for either profanity or a run to a drug store. The glycerin not only softens any adhesive matter, but also appears to penetrate thoroughly and make it both easy and safe to force out a glass stopper without the recourse to the application of heat.—St. Louis Globe Democrat.

LEFT FOR DEAD.

A Brave, Though Reckless Hunter's Remarkabl Escape From a Bear.

HIS FLESH TORN INTO SHREDS.

Deserted by His Terrified Companion He Makes a Heroic Fight for Life with the Maddened Beast.

Some years ago, writes Henry Howe, the historian of the western pioneers, a party of trappers were on their way to the mountains, led, we believe, by old Sublette, a well known captain of such expeditions. Among them was John Glass, who had seen all his life among the mountains, and had seen numberless exciting adventures and hairbreadth escapes. On the present expedition he and a companion were one day passing through a cherry thicket in the Black Hills when Glass descried a large grizzly feeding on pignuts. He at once gave the alarm and both men crept cautiously to the skirt of the thicket. They took careful aim and fired their guns at the same moment. Both balls took effect, but not fatally. The bear, growling with pain and fury, charged upon his foes.

"Run for it, Bill," shouted Glass, "or we'll be made meat of sure as shootin!"

Both men bolted through the thicket, but the heavy brush obstructed their progress, while the weight and strength of the grizzly bore him on, and he was soon close upon the men. They managed to get through the thicket, however, and were hurrying across a little opening toward a bluff when Glass tripped and fell. Before he could rise the bear was upon him!

Glass did not lose his presence of mind, but discharged his pistol in the brute's face. The next moment the bear, blood streaming from his nose and mouth, struck the pistol from his enemy's hand and, fixing his claws deep into the poor man's flesh, rolled with him to the ground. The hunter struggled manfully and drew his knife and plunged it several times into the body of the furious animal, which was tearing his face and body, baring the bone in many places. Glass, weak from the loss of blood, at length dropped his knife and fell over in a faint.

Bill, who had watched the conflict up to this moment too badly dazed and terror stricken to do anything, now thought Glass was dead, and ran to the camp with the awful tale. The captain sent a man back to the spot with Bill. They found the bear dead and stiff, lying on the body of the unfortunate hunter, whom they likewise called dead. His body was torn and lacerated in a shocking manner, and the bear, besides the three bullets in his body, bore the marks of twenty knife stabs, showing how desperately Glass had fought.

The two men collected their late comrade's arms, removed his hunting shirt and moccasins, and left him beside the carcass of the grizzly. They reported at the camp that they had buried him.

In a few days the hunters moved on, and soon the fate of poor Glass was in a measure forgotten. Months elapsed, the hunt was over and the trappers were returning with their peits to the trading fort. On their last evening out, just as they were making ready to camp, a horseman was discerned coming toward them, and when he drew near the hunters saw a lank, cadaverous form, with a face so scarred and disfigured that scarcely a feature was normal.

"Bill, my boy," called the stranger, as he rode up, "you thought I was gone under that time, did you? Hand over my horse and gun. I ain't dead yet by a long shot!"

What was the astonishment of the party to hear the well known voice of John Glass, whom they had supposed dead and buried. The two men who had left him for dead, and thus made their report, were horrified.

Glass, it appeared, after the lapse of he knew not how long a time, gradually recovered consciousness. He lived upon the carcass of the bear for several days, until he had regained sufficient strength to crawl, when, tearing off as much of the meat as he could carry, he crept down the river toward the fort. He had suffered much, but had reached the fort, eighty miles distant, alive, and concluded his story by declaring, "I'm as slick as a peeled onion."

Short Lived Crazes.

This is a great country for crazes. They sweep over the country like cyclones. Whence they come and whither they go man knoweth not. A few years ago the entire country was in the throes of the pedestrian craze. In every city, town and village athletes were wearily tramping around and around a sawdust circle, while thousands of spectators applauded the dreary exhibition. Nobody walks now that can ride.

Next we had the roller skating craze, which affected both men and women. It, too, has gone glimmering, leaving a trail of broken bones in its wake. The bicycle craze is now upon us, and bids fair to become a chronic disease. The men have had the red necktie craze and recovered from it in time to laugh at the suspender craze of their big sisters. America soon loves her fads to death.—Exchange.

Street Railways in Great Britain.

There are 963 miles of tramways opened for passengers in Great Britain. The working stock consists of 4,067 cars, and animal traction is still the favorite method. In 1891 9,000 horses were employed and 579 steam locomotives; 565,000,000 passengers were carried, and the receipts were $16,471,000. The value of the tramways is about $70,000,000. The value of the roads in the state of New York is $77,000,000.—New York Sun.

A "Pizenous" Man.

One day an old fellow from the Cedar Bluff neighborhood came into the office of The Franklin (Ky.) Patriot and said that he wanted to see the editor on mighty important business.

"I am the editor," said a man, stepping forward.

"My name is Allbright," the visitor remarked; "Luke P. Allbright."

"Glad to meet you, Mr Allbright. What can I do for you?"

"Wall, I sent here the other day and had some funeral tickets struck off fur my wife."

"I hope the job suited you, sir."

"Wall, yes, the job was all right, but it turned out that my wife wa'n't dead."

"Ah!"

"Yes, ah. I had dum paid for the tickets and was about to send them out when the old lady come to. So you see I ain't got no use for the tickets."

"Of course not."

"And I 'lowed that I mout get you to take 'em back."

"Why, my dear sir, I can't do that."

"Wall, but you see they ain't no use to me. Wouldn't like to send out a lot of funeral tickets for my wife when she's in fair health, with an average appetite. It wouldn't look exactly right, you know."

"That's all very well, but I don't want them."

"Wall, send me yo' paper one year fur them, anyway."

"No, sir, I won't do that."

"Wall, then, say six months."

"No, I won't—won't sent it to you ten minutes."

Harder Than Flint.

Last week the state geologist received by express a peculiar stone in general formation rather porous, but harder than anything in the museum. It was cut open by a skillful lapidary and subjected to various tests, when it was discovered to be one of these sponge tips to a mucilage bottle, warranted to keep perfectly soft and moist and always ready for use. I sent it to the geologist "ourself." They are handy things. When you can't get the mucilage to run through them—which is on the morning of the third day—you can use them to cut glass with. She Talked Differently.

My love was a maiden once fair to see,
But now she's a doctor of high degree;
She was once as sweet as a maid could be,
And this is the way that she talked to me:
"Yes, dearest Charley, I long to see
The day when your proud little wife I'll be.
Your love is the sunshine of life to me!"
Oh, a dear little womanly maid was she.

Three years I waited at her decree,
As happy as mortal on earth could be;
Then I called at her "office" my love to see,
And this is the way that she talked to me:
"Levator labii superioris,
Iter a tertio, et anchylosis,
Minimi digiti, splenic cirrhosis
Gluteus, hallux, aortic thrombosis,
Adinfundibulum, sphenoid et antrum,
Hernia, calculus, hystero tantrum,
Thoracic expansion and forced respiration,
Gouty diathesis, likewise amputation!"

Ten minutes I sat ere I rose to flee
As near insane as a man could be;
I breathed one word it began with d,
And then in plain English, "Good night," said she.

My love was a maiden once fair to see,
But now she's a doctor of high degree;
And an old maid doctor she'll always be
If she talks to all as she talked to me.

ORGANIZATION.

The Problem That has Engrossed the Attention of Women for Years.

RESULT OF TEN YEARS' AGITATION.

A Writer Who Says That it is a Mistake for Women to Regard Men as Enemies.—Woman's Utopia.

The problem of organization is one which has agitated women who work ever since the sex has been regarded as a factor in industrial competition, and it is apparent, from the almost daily discussions of the subject, that it is no nearer solution than it was at its inception. The relative sides of the controversy, whether organization assists in the amelioration of the sex from the evil effects of prejudice, have many champions who argue the question of principle with much wisdom and enthusiasm. To a casual observer, or even one who is interested in the outcome of the agitation without taking part in it, the affirmative side of the proposition would seem to be the most logical and popular, and there are many evidences to substantiate this view.

It is scarcely ten years since organization was tried by industrial women, and an observer epitomizes the result in these words: "Organization has in the first place compelled the recognition of female workers as competitors by the males, who previously usurped the fields into which women have since ventured and succeeded; organization has demonstrated the capabilities of woman more than individual merit could have ever done; it has rendered women independent of the influences of men in the adjustment of labor and social difficulties and in the matter of compensation."

Taking this view of the matter, which, it may be explained, is advanced by a Wisconsin lady who is much interested in the subject, it would seem that organization has not only done much to promote the advancement of women, but has in addition opened up a broad field for discussion as to the claims of women for recognition in other than an industrial sense. Our correspondent argues that "a woman who, in the face of the strong opposition of men engaged in similar industrial pursuits, succeeds in elevating herself by her own efforts to an equal plane with them, is certainly entitled to consideration as a factor in both the social and official spheres of life."

The argument is so logical and patent to the student of the social and industrial status of women that it needs no comment. The assumption, however, that men oppose the progress of women and in any way seek to retard their advancement and restrict their capacity as competitors is ungenerous and, in a large measure, will do much to inspire prejudice in men against women. The facts all tend the other way.

Men are not only not opposed to women as fellow workers, but would, if encouraged, do more to assist women in their struggle for supremacy than any other influence could possibly do. The developments of the agitation in the past few years have shown this. Working women have appealed to the national congress and to the legislative bodies of several states for recognition and have obtained it, purely through the assistance of men who realized the justice of the demands. Without the assistance of these men the recognition could never have been secured.

Further than this, women have found, when seeking to obtain the questionable benefits of organization achieved by men, that they had only to be sincere to secure the same. If men are once satisfied that female workers are sincere in their efforts to secure independence, and are willing to render all social propositions subservient to the purpose, women will have no cause for accrediting antipathy to men, but on the other hand will precipitate the millennium of their ambitions much sooner than by working alone.

The natural conclusion to be deducted from these conditions is, That women shall combine their own (as yet disorganized and incomplete) interests with those of men. Organization under such circumstances will obtain for a woman what she wants. Men are to be made friends, not enemies. To obtain recognition from their admirably organized systems of industrial pursuits is as much of a triumph for working women as they will ever secure. This can be done by working with them, not against them.—A Club Woman in Jenness Miller Illustrated.

The Colored Lights in Roman Candles.

In making Roman candles a cylindrical case is taken and packed with a lot of stars. At the bottom of the case they put some of the composition they put in rockets, and on top of each star is some more of it. By mixing certain chemicals green and red lights are produced. FRIDAY, DECEMBER 30..... 1892

The enemies of freedom in France are making the most of the exposure of corruption in connection with the Panama affair to discourage Republican government. In England the Tory press is doing the same and dilating on the great purity of government under Monarchy. A very slight acquaintance with the history of both countries will convince anyone that all the corruption now exposed in France is purity itself compared with what was done under the rule of kings. One of the greatest of the French kings squandered enormous sums in building palaces and making pleasure grounds for his mistresses; and when one of the most gorgeous of these was completed for Madame de Maintenon, and she was taken there by the king in June, she said it would be delightful to have a sleigh ride among the groves and flowers. At once enormous quantities of salt were ordered by the king to be spread over the smooth roads, and the mistress had her sleigh ride among the groves and flowers. At the same time millions of France men, women and children were living in hovels and eating food that the king would not let his dog eat. Under the next king far worse things than these were done. The palaces of France became brothels, and the crowning infamy was the "park au cerfs", the deer park, where little girls were taken in squads to excite the flagging passions of a grey haired debauchee. Under even the best of the French kings, Henry IV among the rest, millions were wrung from the toil worn people of France to support mistresses and their bastards. In England it was no better. "Good Qeen Bess" sold for a lump sum licenses to rob, whereby monopolists were authorized to charge extortionate prices for salt and other necessaries, and the robbers piled up vast fortunes. Under her successor, James I, corruption ran riot, and all sorts of crimes were common among his courtiers, murder by poison included. Charles I was a moral man and opposed to let anyone but himself rob the public; but in that he was "thorough" and attempted to rob the English people of every vestige of their liberties, though his tool Strafford and himself were reduced in stature by the operation. Under Charles II the last depths of corruption were reached. The king himself accepted bribes from the French king to betray his own government. He filled his palaces with prostitutes and their bastards, and among his favorite "noble" associates were some of the most reckless and corrupt scoundrels that ever went unhung. Under James II it is only necessary to mention the name of Jeffreys to include every form of corruption, cruelty, debauchery and all wickedness that man can be guilty of. And this man was the Lord Chancellor of England. William III tried to hold corruption in check, but so steeped in corruption were the English statesmen of his day that even his stern resolve was not able to prevent the reckless corruption among them. Under Anne, Marlborough robbed the very armies he commanded. He took bribes from France to betray other Generals and inform the French where armies were to be sent. Yet the highest title of nobility was conferred upon him and he ocrupied the most important positions and died the richest man in England. Other "noble" scoundrels took bribes from contractors for supplies for the navy. Meat was given to the crews that sharks or dogs would not eat and all provided for the men was so vile that a general mutiny burst out and for some days London would have been at the mercy of any hostile fleet. Two brave sailors who had been leaders among the outraged and desperate seamen were hanged; but all the scoundrels in office who had shared in the plunder were allowed to retain their ill gotten gains, and some of their descendants are now among the greatest nobles of England. Under all four of the Georges every form of corruption, moral as well as venal, was rampant, and to describe the scandals would fill volumes. Even the reign of Victoria is not free from scandals as bad as any now exposed in France. In the Crimean war English soldiers in front of the enemy died of hunger and cold, after enormous sums had been paid to contractors for supplying abundance of food and all other necessaries. Men who had been wounded in battle and would have recovered with moderate good treatment died for want of shelter and through the use of adulterated food and medicine. And such is the history of all monarchies. There is no exception to it in any age or nation, except for such instances as Frederick the Great and a few more like him; and even those few simply monopolized the whole business of public robbery. Under Monarchy great corruptionists are shielded and scandals are hushed up. It is only among Republics that the discovery of corruption among men in high offices is followed by instant exposure, and that they are driven from office. The purest and best governments in existence are Switzerland and the United Statss. France is being educated to follow their example and will come out of her present trouble more firmly attached to a Republican form of government than before, knowing better how it should be conducted.

Agog Over Hidden Treasure.

No little excitement has been occasioned near Waynetown by some mysterious excavations and the reported removal of buried treasure on the Broderich farm, several miles from that place. About forty years ago a band of robbers and counterfeiters, headed by old Jason Spray, caused a reign of terror in that section. They were known to have captured and concealed large sums of money. Finally the section arose in arms and wiped out the whole nest except a couple of the desperadoes, named Wright and Newman, who escaped. Search was made for their ill gotten gains without success, and the robber band and its hidden treasure eventually became only gossip and tradition. The old Spray cabin was a haunted place for many years, but was finally burned, and for the last quarter of a century the very location has been lost sight of, it merely being known that it once stood in one of the Broderich fields.

The other morning the men on this farm upon going to work in a wheat field were astounded to find a long trench dug in the earth, ending at what proved to be the fireplace of the old Spray cabin. The stones of the hearth had been plowed over until two feet under ground, so the person unearthing them must have had an accurate knowledge of their location. These stones had been removed by the persons excavating and two holes sunk in the ground for some little depth. From one of these it was evident that a box had been taken and carried off. What it contained and who took it are questions which have set the whole region agog. Two Texans who had been loitering about and who disappeared the night of the digging are supposed to have some connection with the affair. It is said that they obtained a knowledge of the buried treasure from Wright or Newman and came after many years to claim it.—Indianapolis News.

Mrs. Ye Joins the Church.

The members of the Corean legation in Washington are showing themselves more progressive than any of the orientals of the diplomatic corps. When the Coreans arrived four years ago they wore gorgeous silk gowns, long pigtails and peculiar ventilated hats which looked like flytraps. They were followed about the city by a mob of small boys, but they soon laid aside their orientat garb. Over a year ago the men at the legation did away with their pigtails and donned trousers. Then Mrs. Ye, wife of the minister, began wearing the most fashionable gowns of American make, and her home became a social center among the diplomats.

Mrs. Ye has now become a member of the Presbyterian church. For some time she and her husband have attended the Church of the Covenant, occupying seats directly back of President Harrison. It is only within recent days, however, that Mrs. Ye had her name entered as a member of the church. She took the step while visiting in a small Virginia town near here. It is understood that the Corean minister and other members of the legation will follow the example of Mrs. Ye.—Chicago News-Record.

The Bother Occasioned by a Czar.

Many troubles and vexations were caused by a visit which was paid the other day by the czar to the military camp at Izora. The latter place is a village on the Neva, about ten miles from St. Petersburg, and accessible by water or rail. On the occasion of the visit soldiers were placed on the railway. Not far from the city are a number of mills, the workmen at which live on the opposite side of the line, going home daily for their meals. These workmen got to their work on Saturday morning, but were not allowed to cross the line again the whole day, being obliged to go without their food or buy it in a public house. No traffic was allowed.

Even people who had their own farm lands on the sides of the railway were forbidden to walk across. The trains from Moscow were stopped and were sent off all within a quarter of an hour of each other in the evening. The river traffic was also entirely suspended. It can be readily imagined what discomfort such suspension of traffic occasioned, and it is only a Russian official who can see the good of it.—London News.

Candles Burning in a Cemetery.

Every one of the several hundred graves in the Cemetery of the Most Holy Redeemer, on East Biddle street, has been decked with flowers and lighted with candles during the past two days. The big congregations of St. Michael's and St. James' Catholic churches, who use the cemetery, have decorated the graves in honor of All Souls' Day. For two days men, women and children have been coming and going, some on foot and some in carriages, while many carried lunch with them and spent a whole day with the dead. At nightfall the candles sent up a pale flutter of light from each mound. The visit to the burying place is a survival of the former custom of celebrating mass and offering prayers for the repose of the souls in purgatory.—Baltimore Sun.

The Merchants' National bank of Baltimore received the other day an old continental thirty dollar bank note. It is not known whether the note is genuine or not.

A Demand for Bibles.

While lingering in a down town book store a few days before election the writer noticed that there was an unusual demand for Bibles. One man ran in hurriedly and bought four Bibles, another took two and a messenger boy presented an order for six. The bookseller was asked if this increased interest in the Scriptures was due to special mission work in the neighborhood, and he replied with a grin: "Yes, election mission work. Them Bibles is used by registration boards to swear the voters on." —New York Times.

Lofty Climbing.

The loftiest point so far as yet known to have been attained by a mountain climber is 23,700 feet, which was accomplished a few years ago by a Mr. Graham in the Himalayas. He states that in spite of the great altitude he did not find any difficulty in breathing, nor did he experience nausea, bleeding at the nose or temporary loss of sight or hearing. The motion of the heart was, however, perceptibly affected, as its beating became audible and its rate was decidedly increased.—Exchange.

Fire Put Out with Cider.

Baker's Summit is without water for more than scanty use for absolute necessity. When fire broke out in the dwelling of George Croft the other afternoon it looked as if the place was doomed. A bright idea struck Croft. He remembered some barrels of cider in the yard. A bucket line was formed between the cider barrels and the blazing roof. Three barrels of No. 1 cider did the business, and the fire was quenched with comparatively little loss.—Cor. Pittsburg Dispatch.

A Senator Fails to Vote.

Senator W. A. Peffer did not vote this year. While campaigning over the state he forgot to register, and his name is not on the pollbooks in the Fourth ward of Topeka, where he resides.—Cor. Kansas City Times.

Charles Baker, of Sioux City, Ia., died a few days ago from the effects of a peanut getting in his windpipe and choking him to death.

The Advance of Coeducation.

Dr. Chaney, president of Bates college, illustrates the progress of coeducation by telling the story of how a man in 1865, on being asked how many students were attending the college, answered, "Forty-three students and a nigger and a woman," and adds, "Now there are forty women in the classes."

The ball this evening will open with a grand march beginning promptly at 8:30.

They are making careful prepara tions to entertain us with a drama on February 22nd. We must observe the order of Prince Hamlet and see that they are "well used."

Tim Quinn was shot and killed by Dan Holland at Butte, Montana, last Friday night. It is reported to be a case of cold blooded murder. Quinn was long employed as boss bulk header at the Con Virginia mine on the Comstock.

James McBride and Charles Levy of Bishop were engaged the past day or two at the Land Office here, arguing a contested location. Mr. McBride claims a tract of 160 acres a few miles north from Bishop. The location was made as a desert entry. Levy alleges that the land is not desert within the meaning of the law; hence the contest. Several witnesses were examined on both sides.

The Teachers' Institute is reported to have been more successful and interesting than was expected. The absence of the State Superintendent was a disappointment and on the first day of the meeting had a depressing effect. But this did not last long. Among the teachers were several graduates from the State Normal School. These are familiar with the work of Institutes, and they are credited with the interest that marked the proceedings from beginning to end.

Notice is hereby given that a bay colt, now about three years old, has been pastured and cared for at my place since September 24, 1890. Unless the owner of said colt shall pay the expense incurred and take said animal away it will be sold at public sale by the undersigned.

Will be Short.

When the present school term at Independence began it was expected to continue full eight months. Now it is found that the school money will fall short and that we will not have more than seven months school, and perhaps even less than that. It is to be regretted that any child should lose one day of so short a term.

The School Law.

There is a provision of the school law to the effect that in counties containing less than twenty school districts, the County Superintendent may at his discretion order that a county Teachers Institute be held each year. In counties containing twenty or more districts the Institute must be held each year. It is suggested that the law should be amended so as to give the County Board of Education the discretion to determine when and where Institutes shall be held in counties having less than twenty school districts. This would free the Superintendent from a task that at present is sometimes embarrassing, and would be better for the schools and the teachers, as all the members of the Board together would be better able than the Superintendent to determine whether or not it would be best to hold an Institute in any particular year.

A Tragedy at Last.

A telegram to the following effect came over the wire yesterday:—Henry B. Boland and John Thomas were together walking toward the Postoffice. The house occupied by William Crapo is about sixty feet distant from the office. After the men had passed Crapo's house he opened the door and fired after them. Boland fell dead at the first shot, which struck him in the back. When Boland fell Thomas started to get behind a wagon that was near, but before he could reach it he got one bullet in the right shoulder one in the right wrist and another in the left leg. The full effect of the wounds received by Thomas could not be stated till examined by a doctor. After the first shot was heard Thomas turned to look where it came from and saw Crapo standing in the door of his house. Doctor I. J. Woodin left Independence yesterday afternoon for Cerro Gordo to attend to Thomas. This tragedy is the outcome of the trouble over the late election at Cerro Gordo. H. B. Boland had been in business as a merchant at Cerro Gordo several years; he was Postmaster when killed; he was aged forty-two years and a native of Pennsylvania. A widow and five children are left to lament this awful tragedy. John Thomas is a native of Wales and has been mining at Cerro Gordo several years; he is foreman of the Newtown mine. He is a very quiet, well disposed man and has no family; his age is 47 years. Crapo is one of the oldest residents at Cerro Gordo; he is a well educated man, by profession a civil engineer, but for many years engaged in mining. He is a native of Illinois, aged about 47 years. When the report reached here Sheriff Gorman at once telegraphed a posse at Keeler to go to Cerro Gordo, nine miles distant, and arrest Crapo. The posse left Keeler after six o'clock last evening. In the mean time Under Sheriff Holland and Charlie Collins started from Independence; they reached Keeler soon after ten o'clock last night and pushed on to Cerro Gordo. If Crapo resists he is a man who would be hard to take.

The latest report this morning from Cerro Gordo is that Crapo had gone, nobody knew where. Beyond Cerro Gordo is the wilderness of deserts and mountains extending hundreds of miles, all of which he knows. He might make his way to Arizona. He has no family.

Christmas at Pleasant Valley.

INYO INDEPENDENT:

A cordial invitation from Mr. and Mrs. John McGee to be their guest for a few weeks, was the occasion of my being at their home at Pleasant Valley at Christmas. On my arrival some time before the great festival I found my friends busy preparing to have a festival. Forty guests were invited, and all of them were evidently happy when they met their entertainers. Beautiful decorations of evergreens were in all the rooms and in one of them adjoining the parlor a christmas tree was erected, its branches filled with bright hued decorations and heavily laden with beautiful and costly presents for all the guests. At noon this room was darkened, the tree was made brilliant with a great number of lights and the presents were distributed; no one had been overlooked by Santa Claus, and the pleasure of each guest added to the enjoyment of all the rest. From the tree the company were conducted to the dining room. Here another beautiful scene was presented; the tables were arranged in the form of a cross, they were decorated with artistic skill and loaded with a bountiful feast. Among other good things was a pig cooked in old southern style, throned in the centre and surrounded by a noble train of roast turkeys. Many varieties of cakes adorned the tables, their exterior decoration a just indication of their interior excellence. At the end of a day of unbroken pleasure the company took leave of their kind entertainers, and it is safe to say that in the memory of all present Christmas day at Pleasant Valley will be a bright recollection.

MRS. A. R. BROWN.

The Grand Jury Report.

In brief the Grand Jury reported that they had examined in four criminal charges and found one true bill and ignored the other three charges. One charge was partially examined, but not enough evidence was found to prove if the charge was true or false. The Court House was examined and reported to be in good condition. The County officers were commended for neatness and order in their several apartments. The County Hospital was reported generally well conducted and the necessities of the patients fairly well provided for, but strongly recommended that wider and better beds than those now in use be provided. It was decided to employ an expert to examine the county books, and a committee was appointed to employ said expert. The jury then adjourned till April 25th next. One of the charges examined by the Grand Jury was the robbery of an Indian near Lone Pine. The man had gone from Georges Creek with corn and sold it for twenty-five dollars. Soon after leaving Lone Pine he was stopped by two men and robbed. Charges were made against Frank Relles and Louis Padillo, but the Jury failed to find sufficient proof. The attempt to rob John Counts was another charge that failed for want of proof. The true bill found was against William Crapo, charged with obstructing an election at Cerro Gordo.

Constant Expense and Danger.

For years past every time the river rises there is a big bill of expense to the county keeping the old bridge at Independence from being swept away. The usual thing occurred again this week; for some days men and teams were busy hauling rocks to keep the ramshackle pile of old rubbish from being swept to the lake. At all times the bridge is dangerous for heavy loads; and frequently it is a risk of life to cross it. Being the only passage across the river from Independence to the railroad there is much travel across it, consequently constant danger of a big bill against the county for damages for destruction of property, and even loss of life. Surely it would be economical, as well as securing safety, to build a new bridge.

Lone Pine Church.

Proposals are invited for the construction of a Church at Lone Pine. Plans and specifications may be seen at the office of E. H. Edwards, Lone Pine. Sealed bids to be received and opened at a Trustees' meeting to be held on Saturday afternoon Dec. 31, 1892, at 3 o'clock, at the school house, Lone Pine. The Board reserves the right to accept or reject any or all of the bids.

Strange Disappearance.

Last Saturday evening a man named Johnson disappeared strangely from Bishop Himself, his wife and one child, a girl of three years, came to Bishop from Utah about seven months ago. He appeared to be a man of very quiet, steady habits, tenderly attached to his wife and child and always very affectionate to both. The family rented a house in Bishop, which is yet occupied by them; they brought plenty of excellent furniture with them and lived very comfortably, but without the least display or extravagance. On Saturday evening Mr. Johnson went up town to get some Christmas presents for the child and other things that were needed. He called at several business places and was last seen about nine o'clock at night. In the mean time Mrs. Johnson had gone to bed, leaving a lamp burning; about midnight she awoke, and as her husband had not returned she got uneasy. At last her distress became so acute that she got out of bed and walked the floor till morning. Hoping on that her husband would return she waited till about eleven o'clock Sunday morning, when her alarm had become so great that she called upon a neighbor and told of his absence. Several men at once started to search for him, and all Bishop and several miles around were carefully examined, but without any trace being found. On Monday morning some tracks were seen in the road a few miles south of Bishop that corresponded with the boots worn by the missing man. C. Wonacott and W. G. Dixon at once started on the trail and followed it to Big Pine. They lost the tracks from time to time, but found them again within a short distance. At Big Pine nobody had seen any such man pass, and he must have gone through there Sunday morning before anyone was about. A short distance south of Big Pine the tracks were again found, and at Fish Spring James Jones told Wonacott and Dixon that he had seen a man going south on the road Sunday forenoon, but at too great a distance to be able to describe him. The tracks were followed on and were easily seen to within a short distance of Independence, where greater travel had covered them. Wonacott and Dixon reached Independence Tuesday evening about dusk. They had made careful inquiry all the way, and ascertained that no such man as Johnson had stopped at any house or store on the way to get food. Whoever made the tracks must have reached Independence about 8 o'clock Sunday evening, and passed without being noticed. It is strange how any man could make a journey of forty-six miles on foot and keep on traveling without stopping for food or sleep, as the maker of these tracks certainly did. A man answering the description of Johnson reached Keeler on Tuesday and went on the stage to Mojave. Mrs. Johnson is unable to give any reason for the strange disappearance of her husband. The missing man is under thirty-five years of age, of fair complexion and about five feet five inches in height.

Housekeepers Should Remember.

To Meet After Sixty-three Years.

Mrs. Mary Rayburn, an aged lady from the lower part of this county, is on the way to Alabama to visit a sister, from whom she has been separated for sixty-three years. They were separated when they were small girls, and have not heard from each other since the war. They corresponded during the war, but by some means their correspondence ceased, and until a few months ago each one thought the other dead. Two or three months ago Mr. Robinson, a Confederate veteran and a native of this county, attended a reunion of the veterans, and when he left Alabama the sister over there asked him to inquire if Mrs. Rayburn was still living, and to his surprise he found her in her seventy-seventh year, and as spry as when forty years younger.

A correspondence between the aged and long separated sisters was renewed, and Mrs. Rayburn concluded to pay her sister a visit. So, by herself, she left for Alabama. Mrs. Rayburn remarked that there would be a happy meeting when she reached her sister's home. Mrs. Rayburn will bring her sister back with her to the home of their childhood days.—Warrenton (Ga.) "German Syrup"

I must say a word as to the efficacy of German Syrup. I have used it in my family for Bronchitis, the result of Colds, with most excellent success. I have taken it myself for Throat Troubles, and have derived good results therefrom. I therefore recommend it to my neighbors as an excellent remedy in such cases. James T. Durette, Earlysville, Va. THE END OF THE DAY.

I hear the bells at eventide
Peal softly one by one,
Near and far off they break and glide,
Across the stream float faintly beautiful
The antiphonal bells of Hull:
The day is done, done, done,
The day is done.

The dew has gathered in the flowers
Like tears from some unconscious deep
The swallows whirl around the towers,
The light runs out beyond the long cloud bars
And leaves the single stars;
'Tis time for sleep, sleep, sleep,
'Tis time for sleep.

The hermit thrush begins again,
Timorous cremite,
That song of risen tears and pain,
As if the one he loved was far away:
"Alas! another day—
And now good night, good night,
Good night!"

—Duncan Campbell Scott in Youth's Companion.

A Mine Under the Sea.

There are in England several coal and metalliferous mines which extend and are worked at a considerable distance out to sea. But perhaps the most remarkable submarine coal mine is that at Nanaimo, on Departure bay, beyond Victoria, B. C. This mine is known as the Wellington, and its galleries are situated 600 feet below the surface of the ocean, which here incloses an archipelago of islands very similar to the Thousand islands at the head of the St Lawrence river. The galleries of this pit, which are continually developing extend at present a length of six miles under the bottom of the waters of the Pacific ocean.

Nearly the whole population of the town of Nanaimo, amounting to nearly 1,000, is engaged in the mines of the place, the average daily wages per head being from twelve to twenty-three shillings. Liberal as this payment appears to be the cost of living in that inhospitable region is so high that the miner can after all only just make both ends meet.—Iron.

Natural Sand Blasts.

The idea of cutting designs on glass by forcing sand against the surface of plates and vessels of that material was first suggested by one of nature's freaks just as hundreds of other inventions have been. An observing young man who was summering on the coast of New England noticed that the wind storms in that section frequently gathered up large loads of sand and hurled it with much force against exposed window panes, and that these within a very short time were worn through and had to be replaced. In places where they were protected by leaves, vines, mosquito netting, etc., the glistening surface was left intact. He set about utilizing old nature's hint at once, the result being a machine which does work that cannot even be imitated in any other way.—St. Louis Republic.

His Memory Was Weak.

An elderly widower was so dull and stupid that it was very difficult to marry him. When told to give his right hand he gave his left; when the minister said "Say this after me," he immediately remarked "Say this after me." But when the words he was to repeat were given he was stolidly silent.

"At last," says the narrator, "he confessed that I was somewhat bothered by his extreme stupidity, so in the middle of the service he upset my gravity by volunteering the following apology, 'You see sir, it's so long since I was married afore that you must excuse my forgetting of these things.'"—Cornhill Magazine.

Chinese Long Lived.

From the following figures in a report submitted by the gentry of Kaoyao Hsien, Kuangtung, to their magistrate of the number of old people in that district, we cannot help being convinced of the fact that the Chinese are a long lived race. In that single district there are three persons over 100 years of age 180 about the age of 90, and as many as 3,000 who have reached the mature age of fourscore.—North China Herald.

Old Saws.

Some of the old forms of our commonest saws are pleasant enough: "That which cleuid by the bone myght not out of the flesshe." "A pot may goo so long to water that at the laste it cometh to-broken hoom." "Ther is none that stondeth so surely, but otherwhyle he falleth or slydeth." "Murdre abydeth not hyd; it shal come out."—London Saturday Review.

Little Pet—Yeth, thir; I went in a weal wailwoad twain of cars.

"A real train of cars, was it?"

"Yeth, thir. It went wifout a stwing."

Omitting a few Eskimo exceptions all other spear throwers appear to be ambidexterous. The development of a purely right handed implement points to a southern origin for the original inventor.

The gay feathers of the parrot are particularly valuable to many Indian tribes, and some dances cannot be held without them, though the Indians have to travel hundreds of miles into Mexico to get them.

W. J. Florence, the comedian, once offered $5,000 for a catch phrase about which an American comedy could be written. Nobody supplied the demand.

The chief cause of the decline of population in France is the vast standing army, it being impracticable for the soldiers to marry.

THE QUEER LITTLE COAT.

One difficulty there was about little Hobron. He was very eager to begin new things, and would work at them as diligently as any one while the novelty lasted, but his zeal never held out to the end; he would get tired and throw his work by. Little Hobron never finished anything. He had a top half whittled out, a windmill three-quarters done, a white oak bow without string or arrows, and a ship that would have been a beautiful little plaything if its deck had been made and its masts put up.

It did not matter so much about his playthings as it did about his lessons and his work. The school teacher was delighted at first by Hobron's eagerness to take up every new study, but he soon grew grave when, after a few days, he found that the lessons were never likely to be more than half learned.

This was no way for him to grow into an earnest, useful man, and his parents at last became very anxious about their little boy's great fault.

"Something must be done about it, that's certain," said his father, "or he never will be good for anything at all. We have tried talking long enough. I have made up my mind. I am going to send for that wonderful new tailor to come and make Hobron a coat."

"I suppose it will be for the best," said the mother, with a sigh.

So the tailor came in a great hurry, for he was full of business, he said, making clothes for so many boys in the village, a different patron for each one. His eyes twinkled and his little sharp face seemed to laugh all over, as he worked away on Hobron's new coat. Hobron watched him cut and baste and sew for a little while, and then he got tired.

"I'm going out to plant popcorn," he said, and away he went with a great flourish, swinging his hoe and rattling the corn in the pan. But in ten minutes he was back again, playing with his dog and teaching him to carry a basket.

"Have you finished planting the popcorn?" asked the tailor.

"Oh, no," said Hobron; "I planted a few hills, and then I got tired. I'll finish it some other day."

"Ah!" was all the tailor said, and his eyes twinkled more funnily than ever as he ripped out a few stitches he had just put in.

At last the little coat was ready, and Hobron was called to put it on. He was to wear it to his cousin's house that afternoon. The coat fitted beautifully, not a wrinkle anywhere.

"It almost seems as if it grew on me," said Hobron, well pleased, and he walked up and down before the mirror. But suddenly something on one side caught his eye.

"Why, Mr. Tailor," he exclaimed, "you haven't quite finished it. Here's a seam on the side you haven't sewed up."

"Oh, that's no matter," said the tailor, who was putting up his thread and needle, "folks don't always finish things, you know. I believe you haven't planted the rest of the corn yet, have you, my boy?"

"No," said Hobron, staring at him, "but what of that? And just look here, here's another place you haven't done, you haven't but half sewed in this sleeve. Just look at that!"

And he raised his arm, displaying an alarming space indeed. But the tailor did not seem to mind it at all; he only said, as he took his hat to go:

"Oh, that's no matter; that can be done any time, as you said this morning when you threw down your hatchet before you had cut half brush enough for your mother's sweet peas!"

"Come, Hobron," said his mother, "it's time for you to start, if you mean to spend the afternoon with your cousin."

"Why, am I to go looking like this?" exclaimed Hobron, growing red in the face.

"Yes," said his mother, gently, "until you learn to complete what you undertake you must be made to feel the inconvenience of unfinished things."

At the same time she felt sorry for her little boy, and would gladly have sewed up the seams for him, but she knew that was out of her power, for this very uncommon tailor who made coats to fit faulty little boys did his work in a very uncommon manner, and was not to be interfered with.

"Oh, well, if that's what it's for," said Hobron, in surprise, "then I'll go out at once and finish cutting that pea brush."

"And don't forget the corn," said the queer tailor, with one of his twinkling glances, "and I'll wait here till you come back."

So, away ran Hobron, much amazed at his unexpected predicament, and seizing the hatchet, he soon had a nice heap of brush cut for his mother's garden.

"That's done!" he said to himself, and it seemed to him that his sleeve felt better already. Then he hastened to the corn hills. That was harder work, but he dug with all his might, for his spirits was up, and then he went quickly from hill to hill dropping in the pearly little kernels of corn, five in a hill.

"There, that is a satisfaction!" he exclaimed, well pleased with his work. "I had no idea it could be done so quick."

"Hum, hum," said the tailor, shrewdly, "we shall see how it will be another time!" But he took out his shining needle, and almost before you could wink he had sewed up the seam, and sewed in the sleeve. What a beautifully fitting coat it was! He was certainly a remarkable tailor.

Then off went Hobron to his cousin's house. He played marbles with Dick for awhile, and then he began to cut a whistle for the baby. But the wood did not work well at first, so he threw it down half done, and strolled into his aunt's room, leaving poor little Tommy ready to cry at his desertion.

"Why, turn around, Hobron," said his aunt, suddenly, "if there isn't a little rip in your coat right between the shoulders. Come here and let me sew it up."

And as she threaded her needle she exclaimed at the beauty of his little coat, and its fitting so remarkably well. But when she tried to mend the rip she found, to her amazement, that she could not make her stitches hold. They broke away as fast as she took them.

"I think," said Hobron, uneasily, "I had better go and finish that whistle for little Tommy."

So he went to work again on the whistle, and pretty soon it was done, and gave forth a clear, sweet sound that delighted the baby immensely. Then Hobron ran back to his aunt.

"Please sew up the place now, auntie," he said.

And sure enough, she sewed it up without the least difficulty at all. She would have wondered at the affair very much if her mind had not been preoccupied by a recipe for a new kind of salad that the cook was making for supper.

The very next morning Hobron ran off to school with his arithmetic lesson unlearned, and he did not mean to learn it either; he meant to copy off the sum from some other boy's slate, and slip along through the recitation in that way.

"Hullo, Jeff!" he called out to the first boy he met in the school yard, "lem'me look at your slate a minute."

"Yes, take it if you want to," said Jeff good naturedly, but just then another boy shouted:

"Ho! Ho! Hobron's got a letter in the postoffice! Let's see if it's a long one!" And running up he seized upon a handful of Hobron's white shirt that showed very plainly through a great rip in the elbow of his coat sleeve. The other boys came crowding about, laughing and hooting, and Hobron grew red with shame and anger.

"I won't wear the hateful coat!" he exclaimed, and tried with all his might to pull it off, but it fitted so well and so close that he could not remove it, and there was the shocking rip full in sight to make him the laughing stock of the whole school.

"Oh! Oh!" he muttered; "if I could only have my revenge on that tailor!"

But there was no use in funning and raging, and Hobron felt pretty well assured in his own mind that the rent in his coat would stay there till the neglected lesson was fully learned. He glanced up at a neighboring church clock; it wanted still twenty minutes of 9.

"It is too bad," thought Hobron; "but I may as well go about it at once."

So he sat down on the school house steps and began to cipher away very diligently, to the surprise of the boys who were not used to seeing him in such a mood. The lesson was really not a hard one, and to Hobron's own surprise as much as any one's, by the time the bell rang all the sums were done in order on his slate. He walked into the schoolroom with quite a proud, independent feeling.

"It is better than if I had copied them all, and had a poor recitation," he said to himself.

But where was the terrible rip in the seam of his coat? One of his friends had tried to pin it together for him, and he must have succeeded wonderfully well, for there was no sign to be seen of the place where the rent had been, and even the pin could not be found. But when Hobron went home at noon and told his mother, she smiled a little and said she was glad he had finished his arithmetic lesson before school began.

Hobron got caught once more that day. He was out weeding the lettuce bed for his father in the afternoon, when it suddenly occurred to him to swing on the low branches of the apple tree, and away he went. Up and down, in the sweet fresh air, clinging to the elastic young bough, swung Hobron, and he thought he was having a splendid time, when down the street came his Sunday school teacher, and paused a moment by the fence.

"Why, Hobron!" she exclaimed kindly "you are losing the collar off from your pretty coat!"

Down sprang Hobron with blushing face, and back he went to the lettuce bed, which this time got a thorough weeding. Could it have been that his teacher was mistaken? For when he had finished and put his hand up to his collar, it seemed to be all right; there was no trouble there.

Hobron began to grow careful. This wonderful little coat that fitted him so well had such a way of calling him to account the minute he neglected anything. Why, even if he slipped on his shoes in a hurry without tying up the strings, as boys sometimes will, just as likely as not he would find one of his coat buttons hanging by a single thread ready to drop.

So Hobron improved, and at last he got into the habit of finishing everything he begun, because it was so much more pleasant and satisfactory to do so and not because the mysterious coat was so ready to admonish him. He grew to be one of the promptest boys you ever saw, and it became a real pleasure to see him undertake anything, it was so sure to be well done.

And now a strange thing happened. The coat did not fit him so well as it did at first; it seemed to wrinkle and sit awkwardly on his shoulders. One day the tailor came by, and when he saw Hobron his eyes twinkled funnily, and he said:

"The coat don't fit you any longer, my boy, and I believe I must buy it of you at second hand, and make you a better one. This will just answer for little Jimmy Lake, who hasn't got in more than six shovelfuls of coal yet, that his mother bought a ton of, day before yesterday, and there it lies on the sidewalk for thieves to steal and honest folk to stumble over. Whom the coat fits, let him wear it."

So the tailor made Hobron a new coat that fitted beautifully, and not one stitch in it ever ripped. You can imagine how delighted all his friends were.

Don't you wish you knew where this wonderful tailor lives, children? If you did know, should you want him to make your jackets and coats and cloaks for you, or would you be afraid of his sharp twinkling eyes?—Saturday Review.

A Boat That Was Built with Jewels.

A survival of the devotion of southern women to their lost cause is found in the United States coast survey steamer Endeavor, commanded now by Lieut. L. K. Reynolds. The vessel was built for the Confederate navy by the women of Norfolk, who sold their jewels to accomplish it. The vessel never fulfilled the destiny of its builders, for when it was nearly ready for launching it was partially burned on the stocks. After the war it was restored and completed by the government, so that it has always floated the stars and stripes.—Her Point of View in New York Times.

A Woman's Reason.

I heard a clever woman give as her reason for declining matrimony: That she could not live a dependent life again, and that city wives had to be dependent because there was nothing for them to do in flats, even in the way of housekeeping. She was willing to go on a farm and engage in agriculture, for she could endure privations if she had plenty of remunerative work which ultimately would reward her. The man, more helpless than herself, feared to give up his salaried position, and the woman refused his offer of marriage.—Drake's Magazine.

THEY NEVER FAIL.

J. N. HARRIS, 3 Fulton Market, New York City, says:

"I have been using BRANDRETH'S PILLS for the last fifteen years. There is nothing equal to them as Blood Purifiers and Liver Regulators. But I wish to state how remarkably they cure rheumatism, and how easily; I was affected by rheumatism in the legs. My business (wholesale fish dealer) naturally leads me to damp places. I could not walk, and at night I suffered fearfully; I tried Balsams, Sarsaparillas and all kinds of tinctures, but they did me no good and was afraid of being a cripple. I finally commenced using BRANDRETH'S PILLS. I took two every night for ten nights, then I began to improve. I continued taking them for forty days and I got entirely well. Now, whenever sick, I take BRANDRETH'S PILLS. They never fail."

If some folks had their way about this world, says John Wright, how few people could live comfortably in it.

My son has been afflicted with nasal catarrh since quite young. I was induced to try Ely's Cream Balm, and before he had used one bottle that disagreeable catarrhal smell had all left him. He appears as well as any one. It is the best catarrh remedy on the market.—J. C. Olmstead, Arcola, Ill.

One of my children had a very bad discharge from her nose. Two physicians prescribed, but without benefit. We tried Ely's Cream Balm, and, much to our surprise, there was a marked improvement. We continued using the Balm, and in a short time the discharge was cured.—O. A. Cary, Corning, N. Y.

THE HERCULES.

In placing the Hercules Gas or Gasoline Engine in the field in competition with other gas engines, we do so with the utmost confidence that we are "in it." Our system of operating this engine is so far ahead of all others that it needs but an introduction in any community to insure an immense sale. A woman can handle it. It requires no engineer. It can be started in an instant. No electric spark to get out of order. It oils itself. It beats all others. Write Palmer & Rey, 405-407 Sansome St., San Francisco for particulars. The price and capability will surprise you.

For Simplicity it Beats the World. It has Fewer Parts, and is therefore less likely to get out of order than any other Gas Engine now built.

Daily Newspaper and Job Office.

We have used your four horse-power "Hercules" Gas Engine for nearly two months now, and have not yet failed to get our edition off on time; on the contrary, we find it the best investment we could have made. For convenience it cannot be beat. Unlike the steam engine it is clean, no coal to shovel into a furnace, no fires to get up, no water to watch to keep the boiler from going through the roof—indeed it is simple and economical in all respects, and we feel that in changing from steam to gas we have secured a donation of $100 per year to the office, independent of all other considerations, and that means that $100 is the difference in the cost of fuel per year between steam-power and gas power. Thanking you for past favors, including the great service done by you in putting an engine like the "Hercules" on the market, we are,

Yours truly, PENNYCOOK & HARRIER,

Printers Pleased With It.

We beg leave to report to you on the success of one of your "Hercules" Gas Engines which is now in operation in our office. It is a one horse-power, and readily runs a large power press, and a jobber at the same time, and is then not working up to its full capacity. We have had no trouble whatever with the engine, and for neatness, convenience and power we consider it the best in the field. We are delighted with it, and with the experience had with it, and can heartily recommend the "Hercules" Engine to anyone. Truly yours,

A Leading San Jose Printer Says.

The two horse-power "Hercules" Engine bought last December, more than fulfils every promise you made for it. Am running two jobbers and a Cottrell Cylinder with it, and I am satisfied it would run as much more machinery with ease. I have not had the least trouble with it, and I can cheerfully recommend your engine to any one desiring a reliable and economical power. Have had considerable experience with other makes of gas engines, and do not hesitate to say that the "Hercules" beats them all. The hollow "tube" is a great improvement over the unreliable "spark," and what especially pleases me is that your engine developes more power than you claim for it—something that cannot be said of any other make of gas engine coming under my notice. I never bought a piece of machinery that has given me the satisfaction your engine has.

GENTLEMEN:—I believe I have now given your Gasoline Engine a fair test, and am ready to say that it answers satisfactorily to all you claim for it. It is easily started, steady in action, sufficiently powerful, and cheap in cost of running. I use gasoline gas in running it. It has increased my output of soda water 1,000 dozen per day.

VILE AND UNWORTHY

Of consideration are nostrums of which it is asserted—and there are many such—that they cure immediately bodily ailments of long standing. There are none such that can. Chronic disorders cannot be instantaneously removed. Continuity in the use of genuine medicine, such as Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, will eradicate chronic physical evils. Not the least of these last in the force of its opposition to medicine is constipation, to the removal of which, if persisted in, the Bitters is particularly adapted. Constriction of the bowels is a complaint which should be dealt with early and systematically. So are its usual attendants, liver complaint and dyspepsia. For these, for malaria, rheumatism, kidney trouble, and more recently "la grippe," this highly and professionally commended medicine is an undoubted specific. Nothing can exceed it, moreover, as a means of imparting strength to the feeble and nervous.
